Wesley, Charles (3), D.D., a clergyman of the Church of England, son of Samuel Wesley, the musician, and grandson of Charles Wesley, A.M., was born at Ridge, a village near St. Albans, Sept. 25, 1793. He was instructed by his father until he was about twelve years old; sent to a school at Wateringbury, near Maidstone; remained some years at St. Paul's School, London; entered Christ College, Cambridge, in 1818, where he distinguished himself as a logician; was ordained priest in Salisbury Cathedral in 1821; appointed curate of Ebury Chapel, Pimlico, the same year; became alternate minister of St. Mary's Chapel, Fulham, in 1822; was for some years minister at St. Paul's, Covent Garden; became chaplain to the king's household at St. James's in 1833; subsequently became subdeacon of her majesty's Chapels Royal, confessor of the household, and in 1847 chaplain to the queen. He died at St. James's Palace, Sept. 14, 1859. He published A Guide to Syllogism (1832), and A Short Commentary on the Church Catechism. See Stevenson, Memorials of the Wesley Family, p. 539 sq.

Wesley (or Westley), John (1), an English clergyman of the Established Church, grandfather of the founder of Methodism, was born about 1636; and educated at New Inn Hall, Oxford, where he was distinguished for piety, diligence, and special attainments in the Oriental languages. After graduation he was connected with the Church at Melcombe, Dorsetshire, by which he was sent as a lay preacher to labor among the seamen and others at Radipole, near Weymouth. In 1658 he became the minister of Winterbourn Whitchurch, Dorsetshire, under the authority of Cromwell. After the Restoration he was summoned before Gilbert Ironside, bishop of Bristol, who dismissed him without interference. But he was afterwards twice imprisoned, and in 1661 ejected from his living. He was then persecuted from place to place, and finally took refuge in Preston. He was then called to preach to a society in Poole, but on account of the Five-mile Act performed the duties of pastor still residing at Preston. He was several times arrested and four times imprisoned; and died about 1670. Application was made to bury him in the Church at Preston, but permission was refused by the vicar.

Wesley, John (2), the founder of Methodism, was born at Epworth, Lincolnshire, England, June 17, 1703 (O. S.). His father, Samuel Wesley, rector of Epworth, belonged to an ancient family of high respectability. His mother was the daughter of Dr. Annesley, a man nobly connected, and the possessor of a very exalted character. To this remarkably endowed lady Wesley was chiefly indebted for his admirable early training and his elementary education. His uncommonly fine traits of character, and his narrow, not to say marvelous, escape from the burning rectory when he was six years old, gave birth in her mind to an impression that this child was destined to an extraordinary career. She therefore consecrated him to God with special solemnity, resolving "to be more particularly careful . . . to instill into his mind the principles of religion and virtue." The fruit of her fidelity to this high purpose was the grand and beautiful life of her consecrated boy.

I. School and College Life.—When Wesley was in his eleventh year, the patronage of the duke of Buckingham secured his admission to the Charterhouse School, London, of which Dr. Thomas Walker was then master, and the Rev. Andrew Tooke, author of the Pantheon, usher. To such a grave and gentle-mannered boy as was this poor son of a village rector, his removal from the peaceful rectory and the companionship of his firm but loving mother to the cloisters of a large "foundation" school, and to forced association with numerous rude boys, whose cruelty to their juniors was equal to their thoughtlessness, must have been a very sore trial; but he stood it bravely, and soon won a very high reputation for good behavior, devotion to study, and superior scholarship. When sixteen years old he was elected to Christ Church College, Oxford. Here he pursued his studies with the same exemplary diligence as at the Charterhouse. So highly were his classical attainments esteemed by the heads of the university that he was elected fellow of Lincoln College, March 17, 1726. He was then but twenty-three years of age, yet such was his reputation as a classical scholar, a thoughtful and polished writer, and a skilful logician that he was chosen Greek lecturer and moderator of the classes only eight months after his election to a fellowship, and before he had proceeded master of arts, to which academic honor he was admitted in February, 1727.

II. Ordination and Work in America.—After much hesitation, caused by grave doubts as to whether the ministry of the Gospel was his proper vocation, Wesley had sought and obtained ordination as a deacon by the hands of bishop Potter in September, 1725. The same prelate ordained him priest in 1728. From 1725 to 1729 his time was spent partly at Epworth, as his father's curate, and partly at Oxford; but in the latter year his college authorities insisting on his residence at Oxford, he returned thither and devoted himself to the duties of his fellowship. In 1735, on the death of his father, he was strongly urged by his relatives to take the necessary steps for securing the vacant Epworth rectorship. Believing that he could be more useful at Oxford than at Epworth, he only yielded to the wishes of his friends so far as to make an indirect application for the living (Tyerman, Wesley, i, 102, 103). He was probably pleased to learn that it was given to another. Yet in October of the same year his convictions respecting his duty to remain at Oxford were so modified that he was persuaded to go with general Oglethorpe as a missionary to Georgia.

Wesley spent two years and almost four months in Georgia, faithfully preaching to the colonists; but finding no opportunity to reach the Indians, as he had hoped to do, and seeing but scant fruit from his labors in Savannah and adjacent settlements, he returned to England in 1738. His ascetic habits, his extreme ritualistic practices, his rigid administration of Church discipline, his vigorous method of dealing with prevailing vices in the pulpit, and his highly cultivated and refined nature were not suited to win the sympathy of those rude, self-seeking colonists. Had his character and preaching been softened by that evangelical experience which he subsequently obtained, his missionary work in America would probably have been more productive. Nevertheless, it was eminently beneficial to himself; and after his departure the people of Savannah, reflecting on what he had said and done among them, generally admitted his great worth, and lamented his absence as a serious loss to the colony.

Wesley was now nearly thirty-five years of age, and, except in academic circles at Oxford, was almost an unknown man. No signs of the great celebrity to which he was destined had yet appeared; but his hour was at hand. He was about to receive that spiritual baptism which was the pivotal fact in his career, but for which it is quite probable he would have spent his life in the gratification of his scholastic tastes, quietly performing the duties of his fellowship within the walls of Lincoln College, at Oxford. Wesley's special work was the fruit of his religious experience, to which we will now direct the reader's attention.

III. His Religious Experience.—From his earliest childhood Wesley was uncommonly susceptible to religious impressions. He was reverential, conscientious, reflective, and grave, far beyond his years. These qualities were developed by the religious atmosphere which pervaded the Epworth rectory, by the methodical instruction and judicious training of his affectionate and highly gifted mother, and by the influence of his learned and devout father. Reared in this home, consecrated to the domestic affections, to intellectual culture, and to spiritual pursuits, his mind and heart drank in the sweet influences of the spirit of truth so precociously that his father, impressed by the consistency of his child-life, admitted him to the communion when he was only eight years old. And he himself declared that "until I was about ten years old I had not sinned away that washing of the Holy Ghost which was given me in baptism."

When he was sent to the Charterhouse School, he was like a plant suddenly removed from the genial warmth of a greenhouse to the cold air of an unsheltered garden. The form of religion was maintained in its halls, but the spiritual atmosphere and the personal guidance to which he had been accustomed were not there. Hence the piety of his childhood wilted. He still adhered to the outward duties of religion, but his heart lost the consolations of the Spirit; and though he avoided scandalous sins, he fell into practices which his conscience condemned.

In this state he entered the university, where, for five years, while treating his religious duties with outward respect, he continued to sin against his convictions in spite of the castigations of his conscience. These were so severe at times as to induce transient fits of unfruitful repentance. His love of learning was too strong to suffer his pleasures to interfere with his studies; his poverty held him back from the costly vices which enslaved many of his college companions, but did not prevent him from becoming a lively and witty, though not an immoral, sinner. When twenty-two years of age his thoughts were drawn to more serious views of life by his father's pressing letters, urging him to enter into holy orders, and by the light which broke upon his conscience while reading the Christian's Pattern, by Thomas à Kempis. The conversation of a religious friend, and, after his removal to Lincoln College, the perusal of Law's Christian Perfection and Serious Call, deepened these convictions, and led him to devote himself, soul, body, and substance, to the service of God. The completeness of this self-devotion, combined with his rare moral courage and superior strength of character, caused him to be recognised as the leader of a group of undergraduates which was nicknamed the "Holy Club" by the ungodly students and dons of the university, who also derided its members for their rigid adhesion to ritualistic rules and charitable practices by calling them "Methodists."

From this unreserved dedication of himself to God Wesley never receded. Henceforth he sought to do the divine will with all the force of his energetic nature. But, owing to his failure to comprehend the scriptural doctrine of salvation by faith only, he groped in the dark through thirteen years of ascetic self-denial, ritualistic observances, unceasing prayer, and works of charity, before he gained an assurance that God, for Christ's sake, had pardoned his sins. No stronger proof of sincerity and earnestness can be found in human history than is contained in Wesley's absolute and complete devotion to religion through those long, wearisome, comfortless years of seeking God without finding him. Perhaps there is no fact more surprising in his marvelous career than that, with his singularly large perceptive powers and his familiarity with Scripture and with the writings of the English divines, he lived so long without gaining a right conception of the doctrine of justification by faith alone. And when, on his voyage to Savannah, he saw some pious Moravians rejoicing, while he was shaken with fears of death, amid the fury of a storm which apparently was driving them into the jaws of destruction, he did not suspect that his fear was the fruit of his erroneous views. Nevertheless, his attention was thereby directed to the unsatisfactory features of his experience. He talked much with some of the Moravian brethren after his arrival in Savannah; but it was not until after his return to England, in 1738, that Peter Böhler, a Moravian preacher in London, after much conversation, aided by the testimonies of several living witnesses, convinced him that to gain peace of mind he must renounce that dependence upon his own works which had hitherto been the bane of his experience, and replace it with a full reliance on the blood of Christ shed for him. To gain this faith he strove with all possible earnestness. And at a Moravian society meeting in Aldersgate Street, while one was reading Luther's statement of the change which God works in the heart through faith, Wesley says, "I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for salvation; and an assurance was given me that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death."

Wesley was now the possessor of "constant peace;" but, his faith being yet weak, was subject to many fluctuations through manifold temptations. He therefore devoted all the forces of his mind to the culture of his faith. He sought association with the spiritually minded Moravians; journeyed to Germany; visited count Zinzendorf; made himself familiar with the religious life of the Moravians at Herrnhut; conversed freely with many of their most distinguished men; and, in September, 1738, returned to London, strong in faith and prepared to enter with unbounded zeal upon the duty of calling men to repentance as Providence might give him opportunities. "I look," he said to a friend, shortly after his return to England, "upon all the world as my parish; thus far, I mean, that, in whatever part of it I am, I judge it meet, right, and my bounden duty to declare unto all that are willing to hear the glad tidings of salvation."

IV. Beginning of his Evangelistic Work.—This conviction, the offspring of his faith and love, was the germinal principle of organic Methodism, though Wesley did not then recognise it in that light. At this time he had not the feeblest conception that he was about to become the builder of a vast ecclesiastical structure. Never, perhaps, was a learned clergyman at thirty-five years of age so utterly without a plan of life as was John Wesley in 1738. He knew that his heart was ablaze with love for Christ and for human souls, and that he was possessed by a passionate desire to proclaim the doctrine of present salvation by faith alone, and that he was determined, cost what it might, to be guided by that desire. Beyond this his intentions did not reach. He was a staunch, even a High, Churchman, and very naturally supposed that the fruit of his labors would contribute to the spirituality of the Established Church. Hence Methodism must be regarded as an accident rather than the result of a purpose deliberately formed in the mind of its great founder. It was the outgrowth of a sublime principle wrought into organic form by circumstances which could not be controlled, except by the surrender of the principle itself. The facts in Wesley's career subsequent to 1738 scarcely admit of any other satisfactory interpretation. Let us briefly review them.

There were several "societies" in London, chiefly composed of persons who were desirous of spiritual fellowship and instruction. Some of them were under Moravian teachers, others were made up of Churchmen. Wesley very naturally associated with these societies, and preached to them and to such Episcopal congregations as were open to his ministrations. But his exceeding earnestness, his theory of instantaneous conversion through faith, and, above all, the remarkable spiritual results of his preaching gave such offence to the vicars and rectors of the churches that, after a few months, he found his further access to church pulpits very generally refused, and his sphere of operations limited, in the main, to the rooms of the societies, to prison chapels, and to hospital wards. Neither was there any probability that he would be presented to any church living. At this critical moment his friend Whitefield sent him a very pressing invitation to visit Bristol. After some hesitation he went thither; and his High-Church sensibilities were shocked by seeing that eloquent evangelist preach to an immense congregation in the open air. "I could scarcely reconcile myself at first," he observes, "to this strange way of preaching in the fields . . . having been all my life (till very lately) so tenacious of every point relating to decency and order that I should have thought the saving of souls almost a sin if it had not been in a church." But seeing Whitefield's field preaching divinely blessed, he conquered his life-long prejudices, and, standing on an eminence near the city of Bristol, preached for the first time in the open air to about three thousand souls. Thus the problem of his evangelistic career was solved. The great purpose of his life could be accomplished in spite of closed church doors. He did not know it then, but he really made organic Methodism, with its itinerant ministry, possible on that memorable Monday, April 2, 1739, when, with a courage which in his circumstances was truly sublime, he crossed the Rubicon by becoming a field preacher.

The success of his out-door ministrations soon made it necessary to erect a chapel for the accommodation of his converts at Bristol. Lack of ability on the part of the people compelled him to assume the financial responsibilities of this enterprise. To protect his pecuniary interests thus acquired, and to secure the use of its pulpit to himself or his representatives, he felt obliged to vest the title to the chapel in himself. All this, to his mind, bore the aspect of an undesirable burden forced upon his shoulders by unsought circumstances. But it proved to be the inception of that system of vesting his chapel titles in himself but for which the organic unity and growth of the Wesleyan societies could not have been secured. In adopting it, Wesley was unconsciously working on the foundations of a Church the ideal of which had not as yet arisen even in his imagination.

V. His First Societies.—A still more important step in the same direction was taken in London, July 20, 1740. This was nothing less than the formation of a society, under his exclusive direction, at his chapel in London, then recently acquired, and known as the Foundery. Six months before he had organized a "United Society" in connection with the Moravians at Fetter Lane. But, owing to errors in theory and wrongs in practice which had appeared among its members, Wesley thought proper to invite all who adhered to him to separate from the Moravians. Some eighteen or nineteen accepted his invitation. These persons he organized into a society, as stated above, which, though not intended to be a separation, either on his part or theirs, from the Church of England, must be regarded historically as a germ of the Wesleyan Church. It was the nucleus around which the societies that recognised Mr. Wesley as their ecclesiastical head subsequently clustered.

The rapid increase of his United Societies, and his enforced absences from them while on his evangelical tours, soon made it apparent that some means of watching over their spiritual growth was needed. No plan presented itself to his mind until, in February, 1742, while his followers in Bristol were discussing ways and means of paying their chapel debt, one of them proposed that the society should be divided into bodies of twelve, one of whom should be a sort of leader to collect from each a penny per week. Wesley approved. The plan worked well. In reporting their receipts some of these leaders spoke of having disorderly members on their list. "It struck me immediately," wrote Wesley, "this is the thing, the very thing, we have wanted so long." Acting promptly and with characteristic energy on this suggestion, he requested all the collectors to make particular inquiry into the lives of the members on their respective lists. Six weeks later he divided his London society into similar classes, under the leadership of "earnest and sensible men," who were instructed to gain "a sure, thorough knowledge of each member on his list." At first they did this duty by personal visitations; but this method being found inconvenient, the members were required to meet their leaders once a week for prayer and religious conversation. Thus the class-meeting originated. It immediately became a means of "unspeakable usefulness;" indispensable, indeed, to spiritual instruction and discipline in a system of itineracy which made it impossible for its ministers to perform thorough pastoral work. Wesley illustrated his sagacity, if not his genius, in incorporating it into his scheme of Christian work. It is, perhaps, theoretically open to objections, which some think to be not entirely groundless; yet it is historically certain that it contributed greatly to the purity and spread of Methodism; and it is assuredly susceptible of such improvements, both on its intellectual and spiritual sides, as to justify its retention in the great churches which have grown out of Wesley's United Society.

VI. Originates the Wesleyan Itineracy.—Obeying the unsought calls of Providence, Wesley visited other towns in the vicinity of London and Bristol. Wherever he preached, powerful awakenings and surprising conversions took place. This success begot new and weightier responsibilities. As the father of these spiritual children, he felt it to be his duty to see that they were properly nurtured. And when he saw many of his converts repelled from the sacramental table in national churches only because they were his hearers, he felt compelled to provide for their spiritual culture and oversight. His choice lay between making such provision or permitting the fruits of his labors to become a "rope of sand." Being as yet a strong Churchman, he could not fully approve of lay preaching; but, following numerous Church precedents, he did appoint Mr. Cennick at Bristol, and Mr. Maxfield at London, to take local supervision of the societies in their respective neighborhoods, to hold prayer-meetings, and to expound the Scriptures, but not to preach.

But circumstances soon arrayed themselves once more against his slowly declining ecclesiasticism. During his absence young Maxfield began to preach in London with such power and spiritual fruitage as demonstrated his divine call. Wesley hastened back to London, intent on putting a stop to this irregularity. His mother, then living in his house, said to him, "John, you know what my sentiments have been; you cannot suspect me of favoring readily any theory of this kind. But take care what you do with respect to that young man, for he is as surely called of God to preach as you are." Thus cautioned, Wesley heard Maxfield preach, carefully observed the fruits of his preaching, was convinced that he was called of God to the work of the ministry, and then authorized him to preach to Methodist congregations as his "lay helper." Yet he would not permit him to administer the sacraments, because he was not episcopally ordained.

This unpremeditated step, so reluctantly taken, contributed immensely to the structure which Wesley was still undesignedly rearing. In taking Maxfield as his helper, he in fact inaugurated the ministry of Methodism on the basis of a divine call. And as other men equally qualified and conscious of that call speedily appeared among his converts in numerous places, he could not consistently refuse to accept their aid, since the rapidly increasing number of his societies and congregations demanded the employment of more laborers. Having once admitted the principle, Wesley did not hesitate to apply it. Hence, in 1742, he had twenty-three helpers preaching under his direction; and in 1744, five years after his first sermon in the field at Bristol, we find him holding his first "conference" in London. It was composed of John and Charles Wesley, John Hodges, Henry Piers, Samuel Taylor, and John Meriton, clergymen in sympathy with Wesley; and Thomas Richards, Thomas Maxfield, John Bennett, and John Downes, lay helpers—in all, ten persons. They remained in session five days, conversing freely on questions of doctrine, discipline, and ministerial duty. Among the rules adopted for assistants or lay helpers was one requiring them "to act in all things not according to your own will, but as a son in the Gospel to do that part of the work which we direct, at those times and places which we judge most for his glory." This rule recognised Wesley's authority to appoint his lay helpers to such fields of labor as he judged best; it made unqualified submission to this authority the duty of every lay assistant; it put into the rising structure of Methodism the principle of authority which made an organized itinerant ministry possible, and without which, in some form, it is difficult to see how it could be maintained. As exercised by Wesley, this authority was autocratic and practically irresponsible, and his acceptance and use of it cannot be justified except on the ground that he believed it was necessary, as it probably was at first, to the growth of the great work which Providence had thrust upon him. He saw no time when he deemed its surrender consistent with the peace and progress of his societies; but, whether one agrees with him or not on this point, one cannot fairly charge him with its improper use. From first to last he sought the highest good of his societies, the best fields of usefulness for his preachers, and the promotion of the glory of God in all his appointments. No doubt he made many mistakes, for he was human; but, if ever mortal man possessed of great power was unselfish and pure in its exercise, that man was John Wesley.

VII. Formulation of a Doctrinal Platform.—The doctrinal platform of the Wesleyan societies was formulated, at least in its essential outlines, at this first conference. Wesley himself had, after diligent study while at Oxford, conclusively accepted the Arminian theory of general redemption, and learned to regard the doctrines of election and reprobation, as held by Calvin, with very deep abhorrence. His adhesion to what he believed to be the teaching of Holy Writ had brought him into an unpleasant conflict with Cennick, his lay helper at Bristol, and with his friend and fellow-evangelist Whitefield. The latter, having while in New England become enamoured with its then prevailing Calvinism, took grave offence at a sermon preached by Wesley in 1740 on "free grace," and protested against it very severely in a letter to Wesley, which Whitefield's friends published in England. Cennick espoused the opinions of the letter, and, though in Wesley's employ, sowed the seeds of dissension in the Bristol society. The consequence was Cennick's separation from Wesley, Whitefield's temporary estrangement from his old friend, and the division of Methodism into two branches, the Calvinistic and the Wesleyan. Subsequently the two friends "agreed to differ," though they henceforth wrought in separate paths. But during this controversy the creed of the coming Wesleyan Church was practically settled; and when Wesley assembled his first conference, and its members conversed two days on "what to teach," they found themselves in substantial agreement on the atonement, election, justification by faith, the witness of the Spirit, entire sanctification, and other leading doctrines. Thus Wesley's theological views became the accepted platform of the great ecclesiastical system which he was unconsciously organizing.

VIII. Development of Wesley's Work.—During the five years preceding this first conference great things had been accomplished. Starting from London and Bristol as the centres of his movement, Wesley had traversed the country from the Land's End to Newcastle, and had formed societies in numerous towns and cities. In London alone those societies numbered not less than two thousand souls. Their number elsewhere is not known, but it must have been several thousands. Forty-five preachers, including two ordained clergymen, were laboring under his direction. Unnumbered thousands were accustomed to listen to the quickening words which fell with unwonted power from his lips, and from those of his devoted and laborious helpers. They had much bitter opposition and harsh persecution to contend with, and very little public sympathy to encourage them. The lower orders were steeped in brutality, the upper classes were hardened by scepticism and devoted to pleasure. The clergy were frozen amid the formalities of the Establishment. The Dissenting churches, with their ministers, were too lukewarm to breast the swelling tide of immorality which overflowed the land. They were, as Isaac Taylor remarks, "rapidly in course to be found nowhere but in books." And the peculiar characteristic of the English nation was, to use the words of Wesley, "universal, constant ungodliness." Against this triumphant wickedness Wesley, with his brother Charles, a handful of spiritual clergymen, and his little band of lay helpers, inspired by heroic faith, had entered the lists, determined to overthrow it and to establish the reign of scriptural holiness in its stead. It looked like an unequal and hopeless strife. But he threw himself with more than a hero's daring into the midst of the fray, and led the van of a host which, if it did not wholly purify England, wrought a great reformation in public morals, poured fresh tides of spiritual life into both the Established and Dissenting churches, raised up that great body of spiritual men and women who finally constituted the Wesleyan Church, and effected a reformation which broke the sceptre of ungodliness and made England a comparatively godly nation.

IX. Wesley's Extensive Labors.—In leading this great reformation, Wesley did herculean work. His evangelistic tours, annually enlarging, soon extended into all parts of England, to Wales, to Scotland, and to Ireland. Ever on the wing, travelling some four thousand five hundred miles every year, he preached from twice to four times nearly every day. His audiences were generally large, sometimes vast, and in many places were disturbed by riotous mobs which, like hungry beasts, thirsted for his blood. He also met the societies, the classes, and the official boards whenever opportunity offered or necessity required. The erection of thousands of chapels, the collection of funds to pay their cost, and the choice of suitable trustees constantly required his attention. The care of all his preachers was upon him. His correspondence was immense. He had a heavy publishing business to manage. His journeys, mostly on horseback until the feebleness of advanced age compelled him to use a carriage, were long, tedious, tiresome, often perilous, and were pursued in sunshine and in storm, through the heat and rain of summer, and the frosts, winds, and snows of winter. Not unfrequently, especially during the beginning of his career, they involved many privations, severe hardships, and much physical suffering. He usually read while travelling, even when on horseback, and thus kept himself thoroughly acquainted with the current literature of his times. He also wrote several original books and numerous pamphlets on passing events. He edited, wrote, translated, or abridged not less than two hundred miscellaneous publications, which he published and sold through his preachers for the benefit of his societies. Every public movement for the improvement of society, such as the Sunday-school, the abolition of slavery, the circulation of tracts, charitable associations, popular education, and the like, occupied his thoughts, moved his sympathies, called forth his co-operation, and exhausted his purse. His eyes were open to every detail, no matter how minute, that concerned the growth of his societies or the increase of the kingdom of God. He was always at work when awake, yet was never in a hurry. His industry and activity never were, never can be, exceeded. It is estimated that during the fifty years of his itinerant ministry he travelled over a quarter of a million miles, and preached more than forty-two thousand sermons.

Under this unexampled leadership, continued through half a century, the organization which was begun with the feeble society at Fetter Lane, London, in 1739, had developed in 1790 into a powerful body consisting of five hundred and eleven preachers, laboring on two hundred and sixteen circuits, which covered vast territories in Great Britain and Ireland, in the West Indies, and in America; and numbering in its fellowship over one hundred and twenty thousand souls. Besides this enrolled membership, there were at least four times as many persons worshipping in Methodist congregations. These swelled the number of his adherents, at the time of his death, to at least half a million of souls. But outside of this army of avowed adherents there was "a multitude which no man could number," who had been spiritually and morally benefited by the movement which this truly marvellous man had inaugurated, and which, for half a century, he guided with almost unexampled wisdom and energy.

X. His Death.—Age could not chill the zeal of this apostolic man. Despite of its burdens and infirmities, he would not slacken his labors until the approach of death benumbed his powers. Eight days before his death he preached his last sermon at Leatherhead, near London. His physical nature then gave way. A gradual sinking of his physical forces followed, during which his mind was generally clear, his faith strong, his peace perfect, his hope triumphant. On March 2, 1791, he passed, "without a lingering groan," into the felicities of the blessed life, in the eighty-eighth year of his age. His remains were interred in the burial-ground of City Road Chapel.

Wesley left no children. In February, 1751, he had married the widow of a deceased London merchant named Vazeille. It was an unfortunate marriage. The lady could not, or at least did not, enter into sympathy with her husband's great life-work. She shrank from the toil which his incessant journeying involved, and, after a short time, refused to accompany him to his appointments. Neither would she cheerfully consent to his almost constant absence from home. Hence, after a few years, they lived apart. She died Oct. 8, 1781.

XI. Personal Appearance and Character.—When he was forty-one years of age Wesley was described by Dr. Kennicott as being "neither tall nor fat. . . . His black hair, quite smooth and parted very exactly, added to a peculiar composure in his countenance, showed him to be an uncommon man." Tyerman says, "In person Wesley was rather below the middle size, but beautifully proportioned, without an atom of superfluous flesh; yet muscular and strong, with a forehead clear and smooth, a bright penetrating eye, and a lovely face, which retained the freshness of its complexion to the latest period of his life."

As a preacher Wesley was calm, graceful, natural, and attractive. "His voice was not loud, but clear and manly." He was not an orator like Whitefield, but his preaching was remarkable for unction, compactness and transparency of style, clear and sharply defined ideas, power over the conscience, impressiveness and authority.

In social life Wesley never trifled, but he was always cheerful. He was an admirable conversationalist, full of anecdote, witty, courteous, gentle, serious, and at ease with both rich and poor. Though naturally irritable, he was master of himself, and was, in all respects, "a Christian gentleman." A more charitable man probably never existed. His benevolence was only limited by his resources. After reducing his personal expenses to the lowest point consistent with the maintenance of his health and respectable appearance, he spent the rest of his income in works of charity.

If a man's work is the measure of his mind, Wesley must be ranked among men of the highest intellectual order. A nature that could impress itself as his did on his generation, that could create and govern almost absolutely an organization such as he called into existence, must have been truly regal—born to rule. Had he possessed a more philosophical imagination, and had he given himself to speculative thought, the world might have rated him higher among its profound thinkers than it does. There is, however, no valid reason for doubting his capacity to pursue successfully almost any department of human knowledge. His journals and other writings show that he had a rare aptitude and appetite for both reading and thinking; but the practical cast of his mind led him to avoid speculation, and to turn his knowledge to account in a multitude of channels running in the direction of the one chosen aim of his life. Yet the clearness of his thoughts, while it led men to underestimate their depth, showed the far-reaching penetrativeness of his mind. His perception of things and their relations was rather intuitive than the resultant of a slow and tedious process of reasoning. His mind was therefore less a workshop than a window through which he viewed the facts of nature, the course of human history, and the revelations of Holy Writ, with such clear vision as enabled him to present them to men with a mental force so logical and authoritative, and in a style so terse and direct, that their judgments were convinced, their affections won, and their wills subdued by the truths he uttered.

Wesley's mind was constructive in all its tendencies. Had it been destructive, he would have spent much of his force in efforts to pull down the National Church, which was nearly "dead in trespasses and sins" when he began his itinerant career. He did not do this, because his genius moved him to build, not to destroy. So strong was this tendency that it restrained his natural combativeness, which was large, limiting it to such vigorous defences of what he believed to be vital truth as he deemed absolutely needful to prevent his work from being hindered by the attacks of his many adversaries. This constructive instinct moved him to give organic form to a novel system of itinerant preaching; it led him to organize the fruits of his labor into societies, by which he hoped not to supersede or rival the Episcopal Church, but to fan its expiring spiritual life back to healthful action. But circumstances were stronger than his hopes, and the structure he erected became the Wesleyan Church.

Wesley's character was remarkable for its perfect unity and coherence. He was governed in all he thought, felt, and did by that single purpose which he avowed at the beginning of his evangelical career, when he affirmed his belief that God had called him "to declare unto all that are willing to hear the glad tidings of salvation." This conviction shaped his life. It dwelt in his conscience; it absorbed his affections; it governed his will; it flowed into all the activities of his life; it sustained him under hardships and trials; it accounts for the peculiarities of his career. The most scrutinizing search finds nothing contrary to it, either in his private, social, or public life. Such absolute coherence is rarely found in human character. In Wesley it is so obvious that it goes far towards accounting for that marvellous degree of personal power by which he ruled so absolutely and yet so peacefully over his societies. Men submitted to his rule because they saw that he ruled not for himself, but for the triumph of a great principle; that he held on to his great power, not because he was ambitious or loved power for its own sake, but because he believed the spiritual welfare of thousands required him to keep the reins in his own hands. That this belief amounted to a sincere conviction is evident from the fact that in 1773 he wrote to the saintly Fletcher begging him to prepare to succeed him, because he was sure that, after his death, his societies could be held together only by placing supreme power in the hands of one leader. But Fletcher's death led him, at a later period, to change his mind. Seeing no other man whom he could safely trust with his supreme power, he began to train the "Yearly Conference" to govern both itself and the connection. This he did, not by surrendering his power while living, but by permitting the conference to direct affairs under his supervision. When satisfied by this experiment that it would be safe to convey his power to that body, he executed a "Deed of Declaration," to take effect after his death, by which the government of his societies, the appointing power, and the use of his chapels and their properties, were placed in perpetuity in the hands of one hundred preachers, and their successors in office to be chosen from the body of Wesleyan preachers. Had Wesley deemed it safe to make this legal transfer of his power during his lifetime, he would, no doubt, have done so. The fact that he permitted his conference to exercise both legislative and executive powers for several years before his death is proof enough that he did not cling to power for its own sake. His aim was not his own honor, but the good of his beloved societies.

XII. Wesley's Writings.—Wesley's writings and compilations were important factors in his evangelistic work. Knowing ignorance to be a sturdy foe to godliness, he used the press as an auxiliary of the pulpit from the very beginning of his itinerant career to the day of his death. He consecrated his pen to the great purpose of his life. He had the ability to win a high reputation as an elegant writer; but, despising the mere praise of men, he wrote, as he preached, in the style and manner he believed best adapted to win men to Christ. His most important productions were his Sermons, numbering one hundred and forty-one. They are remarkable for the terseness and purity of their style, in which not a word is wasted; the transparency and compactness of their thoughts; and a logical force which is not subtle, but the fruit of a "keen, clear insight." A first series of his Sermons was published in 1771:—his Translation of the New Testament, with Notes (Lond. 1755), which won approval from many eminent scholars; the text for "many happy corrections of the Authorized Version;" the notes for conciseness, spirituality, acuteness, and soundness of opinion:—his Journals, which portray, as in a mirror, the course of his remarkable life, and are exceedingly curious and entertaining. The first part was issued in 1739; nineteen more parts at irregular intervals:—his appeals, entitled An Earnest Appeal to Men of Reason and Religion (written in 1744), and A Further Appeal to Men of Reason and Religion (published 1744-45, 3 pts.). These masterly appeals are acute, searching, and powerful in thought, forcible in style, and singularly tender in spirit:—his Treatise on Original Sin, in reply to Dr. Taylor, of Norwich, which was so conclusive that the doctor never attempted to answer it, though he promptly replied to every other writer who controverted his opinions. Besides these works, Wesley wrote many controversial articles, which were published separately. In 1778 he began a monthly magazine (The Arminian Magazine), which he continued to the end of his life. He also wrote a Church History (in 4 vols.):—a History of England (in 4 vols.):—a Compendium of Natural Philosophy:—a Dictionary of the English Language:—separate Grammars of the English, French, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages:—a Compendium of Logic, etc. His original prose works filled fourteen closely printed volumes; his commentaries, compilations, and abridgments form a list of one hundred and nineteen publications in prose, one of which, entitled A Christian Library, contained fifty volumes. Besides these prose works, he published fifty-two separate works in poetry, the joint productions of himself and his brother Charles; and, lastly, five publications on music, and collections of tunes. That all this literary work should have been accomplished by a man whose life, for half a century, was a series of journeys, is an astonishing fact. "Looking at his travelling," remarks Tyerman, "the marvel is how he found time to write; and, looking at his books, the marvel is how he found time to preach." An edition of his principal prose works is published by the Methodist Book Concern (N. Y.) in seven octavo volumes.

Wesley, John Thomas, an English Congregational minister and missionary, was born at Burton in 1844, and died Dec. 19, 1875. Mr. Wesley from early youth was a devoted follower of Christ; graduated at Hackney College in 1870, and was ordained at York Street, Dublin, where he secured the warm affection and esteem of the Church. In 1874, under the auspices of the London Missionary Society, he sailed for Madagascar; readily acquired the language; and, during his few years of labor, became a great power in the mission field, and an honor to the Church. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1877, p. 421.

Wesley, Samuel (1), A.M., an English Episcopal clergyman, son of John and grandson of Bartholomew Wesley, and father of John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, was born at Winterbourn Whitchurch, Dorsetshire, in 1662. He began his studies in the free-school in Dorchester, and at the age of fifteen went to an academy in London, where he remained about three years. He was then transferred to the Stepney Academy, conducted by the learned Nonconformist Edward Veal. This academy being broken up at the end of two years, he was sent to the academy of Charles Morton at Newington Green, where he remained until the summer of 1683. During the entire period of his academical studies he was expected to enter the ministry of the Dissenters. He even wrote letters and satires against the Episcopal clergy under the advice of the Nonconformist ministers. His change to the Episcopal Church is thus accounted for in the words of his son, John Wesley: "Some severe invectives being written against the Dissenters, Mr. S. Wesley, being a young man of considerable talents, was pitched upon to answer them. This set him on a course of reading, which produced an effect very different from what had been intended. Instead of writing the wished-for answer, he himself conceived he saw reason to change his opinions, and actually formed a resolution to renounce the Dissenters and attach himself to the Established Church. He lived at that time with his mother and an old aunt, both of whom were too strongly attached to the Dissenting doctrines to have borne with any patience the disclosure of his design. He therefore got up one morning at a very early hour, and, without acquainting any one of his purpose, set out on foot to Oxford, and entered himself at Exeter College." He entered as a servitor and pauper scholar, and helped to support himself with his pen during the next five years, graduating June 19, 1688. Seven weeks after this time he was ordained deacon at Bromley by Dr. Sprat, bishop of Rochester. During the year immediately following his ordination he served a curacy at a salary of £28. He was then appointed chaplain on board a man-of-war at a salary of £70, and held the office one year, during which he began his Life of Christ. He was during the next two years incumbent of a curacy in London on a salary of £30, to which he added during the second year £30 by his pen. He then married Susannah, daughter of Dr. Samuel Annesley, an eminent Nonconformist divine. This occurred (probably) in the spring of 1689. In 1691 he was appointed to the living of South Ormsby in Lincolnshire, where he also acted as domestic chaplain to the marquis of Normanby. This nobleman desired Mr. Wesley to be raised to an Irish episcopate, but the plan was not favored either by the crown or archbishop Tillotson. Mr. Wesley remained at South Ormsby five years. About 1694 or 1695 the mansion which had been occupied by the marquis of Normanby was rented to the earl of Castleton, who was a dissolute man; and, greatly to the disgust of the rector, kept mistresses who were thrown in contact with his family. The marquis was a man of similar habits, and an event occurred in the summer of 1696 which occasioned the removal of the rector to another place. It is thus related by John Wesley: "The marquis of Normanby had a house in the parish of South Ormsby, where a woman who lived with him usually resided. This lady would be intimate with my mother, whether she would or not. To such an intercourse my father would not submit. Coming in one day, and finding this intrusive visitant sitting with my mother, he went up to her, took her by the hand, and very fairly handed her out. The nobleman resented the affront so outrageously as to make it necessary for my father to resign the living." In 1696, having dedicated his Life of Christ to queen Mary, he was presented by her with the living of Epworth, Lincolnshire, where he died, April 22, 1735. For four or five years he also had the rectory of Wroote, a little village near Epworth, which hardly paid his curate. In 1734 he resigned it to his son-in-law, John Whitelamb. Mr. Wesley was always poor in this world's goods. He had nineteen children, had to assist poor relations, including his widowed mother, met with many reverses, and never had more than £200 a year. He was a man of great learning, of large benevolence, loyal, devout, and conscientious in the exercise of the duties of his office. He is frequently mentioned as a Tory and a High-Churchman, but he was no bigot. He rejoiced in the work done at Oxford by his sons John and Charles, which gained for them the name of Methodists and The Holy Club. He penned the following words Dec. 1, 1730: "I hear my son John has the honor of being styled the 'father of the Holy Club.' If it be so, I must be the grandfather of it; and I need not say that I had rather any of my sons should be so dignified and distinguished than to have the title of His Holiness." He was a prolific writer. Among his works may be mentioned, a volume of poems called Maggots (1685);—The Life of Christ, an Heroic Poem (1693);—The Pious Communicant Rightly Prepared, etc. (1700);—History of the Old and New Testament (1701);—Dissertations on the Book of Job, in Latin;—and several excellent Hymns. He was one of the editors and chief contributor to the Athenian Gazette. See Tyerman, Life and Times of the Rev. Samuel Wesley; Clarke, The Wesley Family; Stevenson, Memorials of the Wesley Family; and the numerous Lives of John and Charles Wesley.

Wesley, Samuel (2), A.M., an English clergyman, son of the Rev. Samuel and Susannah Wesley, was born in London, Feb. 10, 1690. His mother taught him to read at the age of five years, and laid the foundation of the scholarship which he afterwards acquired. He was sent to Westminster School in 1704, and was admitted king's scholar there in 1707. He was employed for a time in the house of Dr. Sprat, bishop of Rochester, to read to him at night, and in 1711 was elected to Christ Church, Oxford. He remained there a little more than one year, when he received the degree of A.M., and entered into holy orders. He officiated as usher in Westminster School for the next twenty years. Here he became familiar with lord Oxford, Pope, Swift, Prior, and other Tory poets and statesmen, though he associated with Addison and others of his class. In 1732 he became head-master of Blundell's free Grammar-school at Tiverton, where he remained till his death, Nov. 6, 1739. He was one of the founders of the first infirmary set up at Westminster, now St. George's Hospital. He belonged to the High-Church party, and did not co-operate with John and Charles in their "Methodist" labors; but he often encouraged them in their zeal for good works, only cautioning them against such excess as would injure their health. He is represented as an excellent preacher, and often exercised his talents in that direction. Like other members of the family, he was highly gifted in poetry. The first edition of his poems was published in 1736; a second, with additions, appeared in 1743. A new edition was published, with a life of the author, by William Nichols, in 1862. He is best known, however, by his hymns. See Stevenson, Memorials of the Wesley Family.

Wesley, Samuel (3), an eminent musical genius of England, third son of the Rev. Charles Wesley, was born Feb. 24, 1766. He composed the oratorio of Ruth before he was eight years of age, and in his later years he was considered the most remarkable extemporaneous player in Europe. Among his compositions were, a Grand Mass for the chapel of pope Pius VI.;—a Complete Service for the Cathedrals of the Church of England:—anthems, sonatas, and duets for the pianoforte, and voluntaries for the organ. He died Oct. 11, 1837. See (Lond.) Gentleman's Magazine, 1837, ii, 544.

Wesley, Susannah, a remarkable Christian woman, wife of Samuel Wesley, Sr., and mother of John and Charles Wesley, was the youngest daughter of the learned Nonconformist divine Samuel Annesley, LL.D., and was born in London, Jan. 20, 1669. About the year 1681, before she was yet thirteen years of age, she renounced Nonconformity and gave her adherence to the Church of England. In 1689 she became the wife of Samuel Wesley, to whom she bore nineteen children. The great service she did for the world was accomplished largely through her thorough training of her children. Her method of teaching and governing them was peculiar to herself, and is fully described in a letter to her son John, dated Epworth, July 24, 1732. They were not taught to read until they were five years old, when they learned the alphabet in a few days, and began to spell and read, first a line, and then a short paragraph, mastering it perfectly. She was a woman of strong intellect, and employed her best powers in the performance of her maternal duties. She was a model mother, and her sons owed a great deal of their success to her prudent counsels. Many incidents remain on record which illustrate her singular independence of character, as well as her womanly deference to legitimate authority. For a prolonged period she shared the fortunes of her husband in a country parish with a stinted income; but throughout she maintained an active, cheerful, and consistent piety. The family of which they were the joint head was a remarkable one in many respects, and to its peculiarities she contributed her full share. After her husband's death, she remained a short time with her daughter Emilia, and then resided with her son John in London, and became his judicious adviser in carrying out his great work. Previous to her death, her experience was very clear, much more so than formerly, though she seems to have been a true Christian all her days. She died in London, July 23, 1742, and was buried in Bunhill Fields, where her son John delivered the funeral discourse. See Stevenson, Memorials of the Wesley Family.

Wesleyan Conference, AUSTRALIAN, is the general designation of the regular Methodist body in that province of the British empire.

I. Origin and History.—Methodism in Australia and New Zealand has had the marks of Divine Providence stamped upon it from the beginning. Colonization has been both a source of relief and of impoverishment to the mother-country of England. Early in the second decade of the 19th century, the master and mistress of Mr. Wesley's charity-school at Great Queen Street, London, were sent out as teachers to Australia. An English penal colony had existed there some years, and, in order to raise the character of the people, many of them released convicts, teachers were first wanted. A few agricultural emigrants had settled in New South Wales, and among them Messrs. Bowden and Hoskins, two schoolmasters, who had gone out in 1811, recommended by Joseph Butterworth, M.P., to take charge of the charity-school in Sydney. They were Methodists, and, desiring to have the advantages of the Methodist class-meeting in their new home, commenced the first on the evening of March 6, 1812. Twelve persons met at the commencement, and they resolved to apply to the Methodists in England for a missionary. Mr. Samuel Leigh, who had conversed with Dr. Coke, had offered his services as a missionary, and the application from New South Wales having reached Dr. Adam Clarke, he secured the services of Mr. Leigh, ordained him for the work, procured for him a license to preach from the lord mayor of London, and he sailed from England in February, 1815, landing at Port Jackson Aug. 10 of the same year. The progress of the mission of Methodism in Australia from that day forward cannot be contemplated without a feeling of astonishment and delight. In 1820 Methodism was introduced into Van Diemen's Land; in 1822 it reached the Friendly Islands and the neighboring groups; in 1823, New Zealand; in 1835, the Fiji Islands welcomed their first Methodist missionary; in 1838 a mission was commenced in South Australia; and in 1839, Western Australia. Thus, within a quarter of a century, the whole country was visited by Methodist missionaries where there was population to whom they could minister. The pioneers who early united their efforts to those of Samuel Leigh were John Waterhouse, Walter Lowry, Benjamin Carvoso, and John H. Bumby, followed by others who are still laboring there, and their valuable and useful services will preserve their memories fresh in the country for many generations.

The marvellous triumphs of Christianity in nearly all the localities named were equalled only by the heroic devotion of the missionaries and their wives. It would not be possible to describe the scenes of degradation and ferocity which they had for many years to confront. The Life of Samuel Leigh (an octavo volume of 590 pages) and the Rev. James Buller's Forty Years in New Zealand are two works which supply such a variety of valuable and interesting facts descriptive of the trials and triumphs of Methodism in Australia and New Zealand that any abridgment of their contents would be impossible in the compass of these pages.

It is due to the convict class of the inhabitants to record that many of them, after their conversion, became the most active, energetic, and useful helpers of the good cause. Among them have been class-leaders, stewards, local preachers, and some have become wealthy, and devoted much of their substance to the erection of Methodist churches, parsonages, and schools. Mr. Leigh records of one of the earliest of the convicts, Mr. E——, who was an educated Irishman designed for the bar, but who, for forgery, had been sentenced to death, that he was converted while in his Irish prison, and had his sentence commuted to transportation for life. His Methodist friends gave him a Bible to be his companion in his banishment. He read the Bible and liturgy to his fellow-convicts; and his intelligent, consistent Christian life soon secured him his liberty. He taught a school, preached in the villages on the Sabbath, and commenced the first Methodist class-meeting at Windsor in 1812. In his humble way, he was probably the first Methodist preacher in the southern world. The members gathered by this young Irishman held the first Methodist love-feast in that country on April 3, 1812. The missionaries sought out many of the banished ones, and in many instances they had repented and found mercy at the hands of God. The morning of eternity alone will tell how many of those children of crime and punishment will be welcomed in heaven by parents and friends who seldom mentioned their names on earth.

Mr. Leigh was a most faithful and heroic man, and he soon witnessed the erection of three small chapels, one each at Sydney, Windsor, and Castlereagh. Four Sunday-schools were opened, and a Methodist Circuit was formed which included fifteen preaching-places, extending 150 miles. After three years of hard toil, Mr. Leigh welcomed Walter Lowry, on May 1, 1818, as his first colleague, and so rejoiced was he on meeting that he fell on his neck and kissed him. The aborigines as well as the criminals were accessible to the missionaries; but the preachers were exposed to insults and hardships which cannot be realized in the present improved condition of the country. They performed long rugged journeys, and often slept on boards or on the bare earth, with their saddle-bags as pillows and overcoats for covering; but they witnessed such triumphs as more than compensated them for all their sufferings. The foundations of Australian Methodism were thus laid broad and deep, and possibly that form of religion may ultimately dominate in that vast country.

Cheered by the prospect which was opening before him, Mr. Leigh returned to England in 1820 to plead for more men to extend the work, and he took out with him William Horton and Thomas Walker. The latter intended to open a station among the natives, among whom he commenced to labor; but owing to their nomadic character the success did not justify the continuance of that station after 1828. Another and more satisfactory effort was made in 1836, when a new station was opened at Port Philip, South Australia, with two missionaries, and one at Perth, Western Australia. In 1838 Methodism was introduced into Geelong by two missionaries. These men endure immense hardships. They acquired the native languages, translated portions of the Scriptures, commenced schools, established printing, wrote and published school-books, and founded a training institution for native preachers and teachers. At each station the missionaries conducted a farm on which the people were taught agriculture, the farms supplying the preachers with a large portion of their income in those early days.

Mr. Horton commenced his labors in Tasmania, or Van Diemen's Land, in 1820. The population there was utterly demoralized, both convicts and natives. Among the former were found a few who had been Methodists, who had repented of their evil doings, and had commenced a society class, and were erecting a chapel. The mission prospered there, under the fostering smile of the governor, who, seeing the good results of the labors of the missionaries, in 1827 applied for additional preachers, offering to pay their passage out and partial support on arrival. In 1832 William Butters commenced a new station at Port Arthur, another convict settlement. Successive governors testified to the value of these missionaries' labors among the convicts, and in 1837 the work was extended by the arrival of four more preachers.

A survey was made of the progress of the mission on that continent in 1839, when they were reported to be nine missionaries, 570 members of society, and 922 scholars. To extend and consolidate the work, the Rev. John Waterhouse was appointed general superintendent of all the Australian and Polynesian missions; but his exhaustive and earnest labors ended his earthly career in three years, though the work was extended. William Binnington Boyce succeeded him, and he became the president of the first Australian Conference in 1855. Samuel Leigh, on his return from England in 1821, made an inroad on New Zealand. His first experiment was not encouraging. On entering one of the native villages, he passed twelve human heads, tattooed, placed on the pathway. That sight helped to determine him to endeavor to dispel the darkness and misery which prevailed. He secured the help of Messrs. Turner and White, and commenced a mission at Wagarea, on the north-east coast. They were surrounded by ferocious and savage men. One day Mr. Turner saw several chiefs seated at a fire, roasting one of their slaves between two logs of wood, to make them a meal. These natives became more enlightened, the work prospered, natives were converted, chapels were erected, and much good was done; but in 1827 war broke out, the mission was stopped, and the missionaries fled to Sydney. In 1828 they returned, at the invitation of one of the chiefs, and commenced a new mission at Maungungu, which for two years made but little progress. After 1830 the work revived, conversions increased rapidly, more missionaries were sent, and so satisfactory was the conduct of the people that one of the missionaries in 1834 wrote, "In reverential behavior in the house of God, the awakened aborigines were a pattern even to Europeans, and tokens of many kinds were given that a glorious work was beginning in New Zealand." Those signs proved true. Deputations were sent from the Southern Island to the missionaries for preachers and teachers; more missionaries were sent out, who soon mastered the language of the natives; books were written and translated; a printing-press was established; chapels and schools were erected; and an institution for the training of native preachers was established. The blessings of civilized life followed the diffusion of Christian principles; and in 1854, when it was determined to unite the mission stations in New Zealand with those in Australia, to form one Conference, the Report of the condition of the Methodist missions in New Zealand exhibited the following figures: Chapels, 105; other preaching-places, 148; local preachers, 322; catechists, 5; members of society, 4500; attendants at public worship, 11,000; missionaries, 20. So ably had the missionaries conducted their financial enterprises that in 1854 the entire debts on their chapel property in New Zealand were only £360. After such a satisfactory report, there was no opposition to the union of the latter mission with Australia. There were also: Sunday-schools, 188; day-schools, 88; pupils, 5846. Such were the results a quarter of a century since.

The South Sea Islands form an important part of the Australian Methodist Church. Walter Lowry commenced a mission in Tonga in 1822, but it was given up in 1823. In 1826 John Thomas and John Hutchinson resumed the work, and in 1827 they were joined by William Cross, Nathaniel Turner, and another, and that gracious work was commenced which has resulted in bringing the whole population of those islands under the influence of Christianity. There are no records in history which can compare with those of the history of Christianity in the various islands of the South Seas for the completeness of the overthrow of heathenism, idolatry, infanticide, cannibalism, with all their attendant horrors; and the establishment, in their place, of churches, chapels, schools, parsonages; the whole population within the space of a quarter of a century embracing Christianity and learning to read and write; and the introduction and practice of all the customs of civilized life. When John Thomas, who still lives, visited the Hawaii Islands in 1880, he was startled to find the king and the people had abandoned paganism and were worshipping the true God, and their idol temples were either burned or converted into dwelling-houses. During a visit to Tonga, where the mission had appeared to fail, the king of the Hawaii Islands had been converted, and on his return brought with him a Christian native and his wife. The king, leading his people by example, was baptized, and he had a chapel erected in which fifteen hundred people could worship. In but a short time young and old, rich and poor, masters and servants, embraced the new lotu, or religion. The king, a man of fine presence and intelligence, took the name of George, and his wife that of Charlotte. King George carried the intelligence of their conversion to the king of Vavau, who, on hearing and seeing the changes which Christianity had wrought, with a thousand of his people at once renounced paganism, and the visitors remained a long time teaching the people the elements of Christianity. A press was established, and books printed by thousands and scattered broadcast on the numerous islands. The press was to the people one of the greatest marvels they had known. Hymn-books, catechisms, and portions of Scripture were distributed by thousands, the natives being the voluntary agents employed; and very soon hundreds of these natives, male and female, including chiefs and their wives, were employed as teachers, class-leaders, exhorters, and local preachers, the people learning to read with avidity, and the missionaries' wives teaching the art of cutting out clothes and sewing, as well as other domestic and useful arts. The news of these conversions spread far and wide, and canoes laden with inquirers came a distance of three hundred miles to see what Christianity had done, and these returned themselves to spread the tidings of the new religion. So the work went on till July, 1834, when there broke out on several islands a great spiritual revival. Men, women, and children, chiefs and people, all shared in the outpouring of the Spirit, and on one day (July 27) Mr. Turner records that "not fewer than one thousand souls were converted, not only from dumb idols, but from Satan to God." A little later he records, "Within the past six weeks the number of converts is 2262." For a week they held prayer-meetings six times daily, and as many as a thousand persons were on their knees at the same time, seeking, some crying earnestly, for deliverance from the bondage of sin. Such earnest crying for mercy was, perhaps, never before witnessed on earth.

King George became first a class-leader, then a local preacher, and his whole life was now devoted to the elevation of his people. He released all his slaves, and had a mission church erected in the Friendly Islands, a thousand of his people being employed in its erection. The king had the spears of his ancestors fixed as the rails for the communion-table, and two clubs formerly adored as deities were placed as pillars to the pulpit-stairs. The king himself preached the opening sermon, and thousands of people attended the opening. Such were some of the results of one of the greatest revivals ever known. In no other portion of the mission field have so many native laborers been raised up, and schools, chapels, and parsonages adorn most of the islands. The whole population has embraced Christianity.

The Rev. Robert Young in 1853 visited those islands, New Zealand, and Australia as a deputation from the English Conference to make the arrangements for the union of all the churches in the Eastern Archipelago. That union was satisfactorily arranged, and has worked admirably for over a quarter of a century. At the time the Australian Conference was founded it included nearly 200 preachers and some 40,000 communicants; the societies were nearly all self-supporting, and £10,000 was annually given for missions alone. Since that period every department has advanced. In 1880 there were reported in that conference 433 ministers and 69,297 church members. The Methodist membership of the Australian churches is now just equal to the total membership in Great Britain at the time of Mr. Wesley's death. In another half-century the Australian churches will probably sum up as many members as the parent society.

When the Jubilee of the Wesleyan Missionary Society was celebrated in 1864, a large meeting was held in Australia in that connection, and a fund was then opened which soon reached £12,000, the money being spent in the erection of a Wesleyan college. About the same time another institution came into existence at Melbourne, the erection of the Wesleyan Emigrants' Home at the cost of £3500, towards which the colonial government voted £1000, from a conviction of its philanthropic character. That temporary home has been a blessing to multitudes on their arrival in the colony without friends to greet them.

II. Church Organization and Policy.—In these respects the Australian Conference is in accordance with the parent society. Ministers and laymen unite in conducting the annual conferences; and occasionally ministerial deputations are sent to the outlying churches to report upon and encourage them. The Rev. Messrs. Rathbone and Watkins went over the missions in the South Seas in 1869, and reported most encouragingly of their advancement.

IV. Literature.—The literature which belongs to this section of the Methodist Church relates chiefly to the published biographies of the ministers who have died in the work: The Life of the Rev. Samuel Leigh, by Alexander Strahan, a small octavo volume of 592 pages, with portrait, is the basis of our historical knowledge of Methodism in Australia. Wm. B. Boyce published in 1850 a Brief Grammar of Ancient History, for the use of schools in Sydney (a 12mo of 108 pp.). He has published other works not relating to Australia. James Buller, Forty Years in New Zealand, including a Personal Narrative, an Account of Maoridom, and of the Christianization and Colonization of the Country (1878, 8vo, 503 pp.), a work of much and permanent value. Life of J. H. Bumby, with a Brief History of the New Zealand Mission, by Alfred Barrett (1852, 12mo, 374 pp., with portrait, three editions). James Calvert, Fiji and the Fijians, the Mission history, edited by George Stringer Rowe (1858, post 8vo, 435 pp.), valuable for facts of history. Mr. Calvert has also printed a Letter, on the Life of John Hunt. David Cargill, A.M., A Refutation of Chevalier Dillon's Attack on the Wesleyan Missionaries in the Friendly Islands (1842, 8vo, 40 pp.); also Memoirs of Mrs. Margaret Cargill, including Notices of the Progress of Christianity in Tonga and Fiji (1855, 18mo, 348 pp.). Daniel J. Draper, the Shipwrecked Mariner and his Drowning Charge, a sermon by Rev. Dr. Jobson (1866, crown 8vo, 67 pp.). John Hunt, Memoir of the Rev. W. Cross, Missionary to the Friendly and Fiji Islands (1868, 18mo, 248 pp.). Life of the Rev. John Hunt, Missionary to the Cannibals (1859, 12mo, 278 pp.). James J. Jobson, D.D., Australia, with Notes by the Way (1862, 8vo, 281 pp.), an interesting review of the work. Walter Lowry, Journal of a Missionary Visit to the Stations in the South Seas in 1847 (12mo, 303 pp.). A Second Journal of a Missionary Visit to the Friendly and Fiji Islands in 1850, edited by the Rev. Elijah Hoole (12mo, 217 pp.). Letter from the Rev. Jos. H. Fletcher (Auckland, 1851, 8vo, 100 pp.). William Moister, A History of Wesleyan Missions from their Commencement to 1870 (small 8vo, 547 pp.). Robert Young, The Southern World, journal of a deputation from the Wesleyan Conference to New Zealand—Polynesia, Australia, and Tasmania (1854, 12mo, 444 pp.; the same work in 2 pts.). (G. J. S.)

WESLEYAN CONFERENCE, BRITISH. See WESLEYANS.

WESLEYAN CONFERENCE, FRENCH. Under this head we propose to give a statement of the spread of Wesleyanism across the English Channel.

I. Origin and History.—Methodism had to struggle hard and long to obtain a home in France; but the efforts of many years were at length crowned with success. As early as 1779 Methodism found its way from Newfoundland to Jersey, one of the Channel Islands opposite France. Some soldiers in a regiment from England to Jersey, being Methodists, carried their religion with them, and a small society was formed. They applied to Mr. Wesley for a preacher, and Robert Carr Brackenbury, Esq., a wealthy layman who could speak French, was sent by Mr. Wesley to help the cause there. In 1785 Dr. Coke visited the island, and in 1786 Adam Clarke was appointed to the Norman Islands to assist Mr. Brackenbury. In 1787 Mr. Wesley spent a fortnight on the islands, preaching and exhorting from house to house. The people assembled in the evenings by hundreds to hear him. Mr. Wesley foresaw that Methodists from those islands, having such frequent intercourse with France, would soon take their religion there also. In 1790 the Rev. John de Quetteville and Mr. John Angel visited some of the villages in Normandy; and finding small congregations of French Protestants, joined them, and began by giving personal experiences of conversion. This awakened sympathy, and the people desired information.

William Mahy, a lay preacher in Guernsey, was sent, and was ordained in 1791 by Dr. Coke to preach. He commenced his labors at Courcelle. Dr. Coke then went on to Paris, taking with him Mr. De Quetteville and Mr. Gibson; and there hired a room for a month near the Seine. Dr. Coke was then offered a suppressed church in Paris for £150, which would hold two thousand persons. This will show the low state to which religion had then fallen. Infidelity was rampant, the priests had all been killed or banished, and any pastors remaining did not favor the new religion. The opposition to Mr. Mahy broke down his health, and ended in his premature death. Dr. Coke soon found that Paris was not favorable to Methodism, and retired. Seed was sown in several villages in Normandy, which was not allowed to die; but the Revolution following so quickly on these efforts arrested further progress then.

In the history of Methodism in many places, when one door is closed, Divine Providence opens another. So it was in France. For years religion in every form had been nearly extinguished. The war with Napoleon Bonaparte had resulted in the capture, by England, of thousands of French prisoners; and eleven large ships of war formed the prison-homes of those men in the river Medway. In 1810 the Rev. William Toase began to visit the ships and speak to the soldiers. He was heard gladly; and began to preach and distribute French Bibles, and converts were the result. In 1811 Conference appointed Mr. Toase a missionary to the French ships in the Medway. These soldiers were ultimately, after 1815, returned to their homes, and they took their religion and Bibles with them; and so the way was prepared for the renewed introduction of Methodism. This time it was to be permanent; and although it has had a slow and struggling existence, yet the statistics will show that it has survived, if it has not extended largely.

After the peace of 1814, some evangelists again commenced to labor in Normandy; but the return of Bonaparte from Elba caused them to flee for safety, leaving a small society of fourteen members, which was increased to twenty-five during the year. After the battle of Waterloo, and the return home of prisoners, the Rev. William Toase went to France, and had Richard Roberts and Benjamin Frankland as his colleagues. In 1818 Charles Cook followed them. He studied the language, and so thoroughly interested himself in the people that for forty years he devoted all his time, strength, and energy to promoting Methodism among them.

He is considered the chief founder of Methodism in that country, giving not only his own life, but the lives of his two sons, to the same work, both of whom are as well known in America as in France. Mr. Cook became a doctor of divinity; and when he died, in July, 1858, Merle d'Aubigné wrote concerning him, "The work which John Wesley did in Great Britain Charles Cook has done, though on a smaller scale, on the Continent." The English Conference of 1824 appointed Mr. Cook to commence a Methodist mission in Palestine; but the difficulties being so great, and funds not available, Mr. Cook did not leave France. He preached his first sermon in that country in December, 1818. The first district meeting was held in April, 1820, when there were present five preachers—brethren Toase, Ollivier, Hawtrey, Cook, and Henry de Jersey. The first love-feast was held the week after the district meeting, and it proved to be an occasion of much good, and was long remembered.

Up to the year 1832 the progress was slow and discouraging; but the surrounding circumstances sufficiently accounted for that state of things. The Conference of 1833 sent the Rev. Robert Newstead to give the mission a new start, and the members were nearly doubled the first year. In 1834 James Hocart joined the mission, and he has since devoted his whole life to the work. He still survives; and at the English Conference of 1880 he made a powerful and impressive appeal on behalf of the extension of Methodism in France. In 1835 Matthew Gallienne joined the mission; he devoted many years of valuable service to the cause, and his son is at the present time tutor in theology of the young men preparing for the ministry. The reinvigorated mission soon showed signs of the new power infused into it. Robert Newstead found in 1833 a total membership of one hundred and eleven; in eight years just one thousand were added. Eight years after came another Revolution and the overthrow of the monarchy, which, followed by increased difficulties in conducting religious worship, soon resulted in the loss of nearly three hundred members. Peaceful times followed, and Dr. Cook lived to see the number of ministers raised from 4 to 30, and the members from 29 to 1446—progress which would have been thought small in any country excepting Catholic France.

In 1852 France was organized into a separate conference, and affiliated with England. It had then 17 preachers and 776 members. France was divided into two districts; and in 1853 Jean Paul Cook joined the mission as a catechist. He has since been one of the most devoted and successful of its pastors. There were then only nine circuits in all France. It had long been under consideration to make the older missions of Methodism self-sustaining, while at the same time the Missionary Society in London desired to be relieved of the management of its operations, and thereby give the French people greater facilities for useful and extended operations. The Rev. Dr. Beecham, one of the general secretaries, assisted in completing the arrangements; and with the presence and sanction of the Rev. Dr. Chas. Cook, the Conference of 1852 adopted the recommendation of the Missionary Committee, and France has ever since managed her own agencies, care having been taken for the maintenance and security of Methodist doctrine and discipline, while the operations may take a wider scope. Two years after the change, eight more preachers were at work and three hundred members added to the society. The largest number of members ever recorded in one year was in 1870, when they were reported at 2049. Then came the Franco-German war and the Commune, which caused a loss of over two hundred members throughout the country. In 1880, owing mainly to the want of financial support—all the societies being poor—the total membership is only 1789, being about one hundred less than at the end of the last war.

Many special efforts have been made during the period of the present republic to encourage and advance

Methodism in France. Ten thousand dollars a year more would give the cause an impulse such as it has never had before. There is more eagerness shown, by both men and women, to hear the Gospel and read religious books than ever before. The Rev. William Gibson, A.B., has for some years been using his utmost efforts, chiefly in evangelistic labors; but what is one in so great a city as Paris? There is a bright day dawning for Methodism in France if only the small sum named could for a few years be guaranteed to aid the work. The Rev. Dr. Jobson, Rev. William Arthur, A.M., and other leading Methodists from England have rendered some help; but such help guaranteed for three or five years would work wonders at the present time. Doors are open everywhere for preaching the Gospel; and for some years the preachers have continued their labors for only a bare pittance for food and clothing. The French Conference owns a newspaper and a book-room; but both are languishing for want of patronage. In no country in the world, not even Ireland, have there been greater obstacles in the way of making progress than have existed in France; but now financial help is all that is required to make Methodism in France a great power for good.

III. Literature.—The French people are, on the whole, much more educated than many nations to whom the Gospel has been sent. Infidelity and popery in their worst forms have been the chief sources of opposition to the spread of vital godliness in France. From an earnest desire to instruct the people, when preaching has been forbidden, about a dozen preachers belonging to the French Conference have made free use of the press to enable them to spread divine truth; and although the sales of some of the books have been but small, yet their very existence—copies having found their way into public libraries—has often proved a source of defence, and in other ways have been helpful when the living voice might not be appealed to.

Dr. Charles Cook issued seven publications. A volume of Christian Songs, of nearly 400 pages, ran through eight editions in his lifetime:—A Letter to the Editor of the Evangelical Gazette of Geneva (8vo, 24 pp.):—The Life of Mrs. Mary Fletcher:—Journal of Hester Ann Rogers:—Aphorisms on Justification:—The Love of God to a Lost World, a reply to a brochure by Dr. Malau:—and Wesley and Wesleyanism Justified.

Jean Paul Cook, besides writing most interesting Lettres for many years past in the New York and the Western Christian Advocate, has issued separately, Organization of Sunday-schools (1847):—Life of Charles Cook (1862, 264 pp.):—Letters on Peter (a pamphlet of 30 pp.):—and The Days of a Young Child who Loved the Saviour (12mo, 30 pp.).

Henry de Jersey, who began to travel in 1819, and who toiled long in the vineyard, published in 1837, The Life of John Nelson:—Letters on Sanctification (12mo, 150 pp.):—and the Life of the Rev. John de Quetteville (1847, 304 pp.). His son, the Rev. Henry T. de Jersey, has also issued two small publications.

The venerable John de Quetteville may be considered the father of the French Methodist press. He was accepted by Mr. Wesley as a preacher to the French in the Channel Islands as early as 1786, and he devoted nearly sixty years of his life in promoting Methodism among the French people. He published the first hymn-book for them; but the date of the first edition is uncertain. A Collection of Methodist Hymns, in French, was first published in London in 1786, the first year of Mr. de Quetteville's labors as a preacher, but it is attributed to Mr. R. C. Brackenbury; so, also, is another and larger collection issued in 1799. Mr. de Quetteville prepared and issued a new edition of the hymn-book in 1818, in various sizes. In the same year he translated and published in French John Wesley's Sermon on the Truth of Christianity. He afterwards issued French translations of other sermons by John Wesley. He translated the Life of William Bramwell into French, and published it; besides which he was for thirty-four years the editor of the Methodist Magazine, in French. The Rev. Matthew Gallienne became the editor after Mr. de Quetteville.

Francis Farjat, who served the ministry from 1842 to 1856, published a volume of 150 pages, 18mo, on the Spirit and Tendencies of the Christians called Methodists:—also a small volume, Notice sur Louis Jaulmes:—and a Biography of Mademoiselle Marie Temple (18mo, 60 pp.).

L. F. Galland, who began to itinerate in 1861, issued a pamphlet appeal of 90 pages: Know You the Truth of Christianity.

Matthew Gallienne, who began to itinerate in the French Conference in 1835, published in 1868 a Collection of Hymns for Sunday-schools, edited conjointly by himself and Mr. Hancock. He also issued, for four years, a monthly periodical called Le Missionnaire, which would have done much good had it been patronized. As the editor of the French Methodist Magazine, Mr. Gallienne rendered great and permanent service up to the time of his death.

Philip Guiton, who has now been forty years in the ministry, published, in 1846, Histoire du Méthodisme Wesleyan dans les Iles de la Manche:—in 1864 he published a French translation of Rev. William Arthur's Tongue of Fire.

William J. Hancock, who travelled many years in the French Conference from 1838, published in French a Summary of the Laws, Organization, and Discipline of the English Methodists, in 1858, a pamphlet of 50 pages:—also An Exposition of the First Epistle of St. John, in 1861.

James Hocart has devoted forty-six years to the itinerant ministry in France. He has published five sermons on special occasions—namely, Faith the Indispensable Condition to Success in the Ministry:—The Good Fight, preached at the ordination of Henry T. de Jersey in 1863:—The Christian Pastor:—Purity of Heart:—and The Young Servant of Christ Encouraged. He has also revised a new edition of Mr. Wesley's Sermons.

John Wesley Lelièvre has translated and published in French Mrs. Phoebe Palmer's Way of Holiness:—and Faith and Its Effects:—also a small book, The Death of the Just.

Matthew Lelièvre published in 1865 the Life of John

Louis Rostan, the French Missionary, which has recently been translated into English by Rev. A. J. French, A.B., and published at the Wesleyan Conference Office, under the title of the Alpine Missionary. He has also published, in French, The Life of John Hunt, Missionary to the Cannibals:—The Life and Work of John Wesley, a valuable biography, which has been published in English, also, at the Conference Office:—also a Life of Paul Lelièvre (1868, 133 pp.).

Luke Pulsford, who has now completed forty years of itinerant work in France—commencing his labors in 1841—has published a Harmonized Collection of Tunes and Chants for Three and Four Voices:—also a Collection of the Proper Names in the New Testament, dedicated to the fathers, mothers, and children.

John Louis Rostan, the Alpine missionary from 1834 to 1860, published Christian Perfection Explained from Scripture. This was translated into English by a lady, with the title The Path Made Plain. He also published an essay on Class-meetings and Christian Experience.

William Toase, one of the apostles of French Methodism, published several Sermons in French:—Memoirs of Mrs. Elizabeth Arrivé:—and Rev. Richard Roberts, one of the missionaries to France:—also An Account of the Wesleyan Mission in France:—and Among the French Soldiers. He was sixty years a preacher.

IV. Presidents of the French Conference.—Charles Cook, D.D., six years; Matthew Gallienne, twice; Pierre Lucas, twice; James Hocart, twelve years; Luke Pulsford, twice; Émile F. Cook, A.B., twice; Jean Paul Cook, A.B., twice; William Cornforth, twice—the first in 1852, the last in 1881. (G. J. S.)

WESLEYAN CONFERENCE, IRISH. This is a convenient, if not exact, designation of the body of Methodists in Ireland.

I. Origin and History.—It is a curious and interesting fact that the Palatines, a body of German emigrants, were the cause of introducing Methodism into Ireland; and it is equally interesting to know that some of those very Palatines were the originators of Methodism in America. About the year 1709, these emigrants, a set of sturdy Protestants, were ruthlessly persecuted by the Romish bigots under Louis XIV, and compelled to leave their paternal home in Germany. Some thousands settled in England, others went to America; but about a thousand found a welcome on Lord Southwell's estate in the County of Limerick, Ireland. Each family was allowed eight acres of ground on lease, at five shillings per acre; and the government, in order to encourage the Protestant interest in the country, engaged to pay their rent for twenty years. The leases were for three lives; at the end of which exorbitant rents were demanded, and the tide of emigration set in about 1760, which led some of the best families to find a home in America; and soon afterwards Methodism was commenced in New York by some of those emigrants.

Methodism was introduced into Ireland in 1747 by a lay preacher named Thomas Williams. He formed a society in Dublin; and during the same year John Wesley made his first visit to Ireland, examined personally the members gathered into fellowship, and found them strong in faith; and wrote respecting those who gathered to his ministry, "What a nation is this! every man, woman, and child, except a few of the great vulgar, gladly and patiently suffers the word of exhortation." Crowds gathered to hear him, including many wealthy citizens. He wrote in his Journal in August, 1747, "If my brother or I could have been here for a few months, I question if there might not have been a larger society in Dublin than even in London itself." After spending two weeks among them, he returned to London, and immediately afterwards sent his brother Charles, and Charles Peronet, of Shoreham, who remained more than half a year in the country reaping much fruit.

At Christmas following, John Cennick preached a sermon in Dublin on "the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes." A popish hearer, ignorant of the Bible, deemed the text a pure Protestant invention, and called the Methodists "Swaddlers"—a title which clung to them for several generations. During Charles Wesley's visit many riotous proceedings were witnessed from the papists opposing the Methodists; people were killed, and mock trials were held, and the rioters escaped, the papists being so much in the ascendant. God owned the words of the preacher. Charles Wesley was firm, so were his followers; that firmness gave courage to the infant society. On the public Green, out of doors, Mr. Wesley often had as respectable a society as at the Foundry; and the power of the Holy Spirit was so manifest that the prayers and cries of the penitents often drowned the preacher's voice. Additions were made to the society almost daily, and the bulk of the communicants at St. Patrick's were usually Methodists led there by Mr. Wesley himself. During that visit Charles Wesley often preached five times in one day; he collected subscriptions, and had a better chapel erected. The Gospel reclaimed the people from error and sin, and persecution bound them together in bonds of affection.

During that visit Charles Wesley travelled abroad into the country. The singing of the Methodists had a most winning effect on the Irish people. A good work was begun in many places, and in some a spirit of transformation was the effect. This was especially the case at Tyrrell's Cross. The people there had been wicked to a proverb; they became entirely changed. In some places the dragons had to be called for their protection; the soldiers became converts, and were the cause of spreading Methodism. When John Wesley returned to Dublin in March, 1748, Charles left for England, with the blessings of hundreds of converts.

Robert Swindells, a lay preacher, accompanied John Wesley, and, being especially adapted for both the work and the people, was made a great blessing. Mr. Wesley began his work by preaching every morning at five o'clock—a plan not congenial to the dilatory Irish; but they crowded to hear him in most places. During this second visit he found out more of the real Irish character, and formed no sanguine hopes of the success of Methodism among the Irish. He tried both persuasion and threatening in his sermons; but the people, while eating up every word, did not appear to digest any portion. What was Mr. Wesley's discovery in 1748 was the experience of Henry Moore in 1788, and also of Gideon Ouseley in 1828. The same may also be said of the Irish people to-day. Traversing Ireland for three months, numerous societies were formed, and half a dozen excellent preachers from England were laboring among them.

Charles Wesley returned to Ireland soon after John left, and he revisited the places into which he had introduced Methodism a year previously. In Cork he observed a great moral change had come over the people. Swearing was now seldom heard in the streets, and the altars and churches were crowded with devout worshippers. He preached to ten thousand people out of doors; even the clergy came to hear him. Returning to England, a fierce storm of opposition was raised against the Methodists in Cork, led by a ballad-singer named Butler. The mayor of the city favored the persecutors; and when the Methodists applied for protection, the mayor said in reply that "the law protected the priests, but not the Methodists;" after which declaration, publicly, the rioters became furious. The whole city was excited. Charles Wesley and all the preachers who had been in Cork were charged before the assizes as persons of ill-fame and vagabonds. The judge soon discovered the nature of the case and the character of the witnesses, and the case assumed a better aspect in court; but the mischief done at Cork that year was not remedied for many years afterwards. The preachers were vindicated; yet two years afterwards, when John Wesley was again in Cork, he was assailed with terrible violence; but God has his own way of defending those who do his work. When the mayor encouraged the rioters, some of the soldiers were converted, and they became stanch Methodists, coming in a body to the preaching services; protection was thereby secured, and the work prospered. Methodism took permanent root in that city; and in 1755 Mr. Wesley was received by the mayor at the Mansion-house; and his visit to the place was then considered an honor to the city.

The first Methodist sermon preached in Limerick was by Robert Swindells, in March, 1749. He had been in Ireland just one year, and had accompanied John Wesley in his tour, and had learned much of the character of the people. He also accompanied Charles Wesley in his Irish journeys. Swindells had not a gracious reception at Limerick; but, though he had a rabble audience, he preached daily on the Parade, which was at that time a courageous act. In his congregation one day was a young man, educated for the Romish priesthood, who was convinced of sin so deeply that he could not rest away from the Methodist services, and who a few weeks after was converted, and joined the society at Newmarket in 1749. That young man was Thomas Walsh, the first-fruit of street-preaching in Ireland, one of the most pious, useful, and accomplished preachers Methodism ever had in her ranks.

Philip Guier, one of the Palatines, was another convert to Methodism at that early period. He carried his religion to the little colony among whom he resided. Mr. Wesley's preachers were invited to preach among them. The colonists greeted them and welcomed them with joy, and soon a society was formed with Guier as the leader of the infant church.

In 1752 Mr. Wesley was again at Limerick, on which occasion he convened the first Irish Conference. There were present John Wesley, S. Larwood, J. Houghton, Joseph Cownley, J. Fisher, Thomas Walsh, Jacob Rowell, T. Kead, Robert Swindells, J. Whitgood, and J. Morris. These, excepting J. Morris, formed Mr. Wesley's staff of preachers in Ireland in the middle of the 18th century. In 1756 Mr. Wesley again visited Limerick, and now for the first time preached in Ballinagarry, the home of Philip Embury and Barbara Heck, both of whom were members of Wesley's congregation. Much of the future of Methodism in the world of America depended upon that visit and those sermons, with Embury and Heck as part of his audience. Wesley says of that service, in his Journal, "I found much life among this plain, artless, serious people. The whole town came together in the evening, and praised God for the consolation. Many of those who are not outwardly joined with us walk in the light of God's countenance; yea, and have divided themselves into classes in imitation of our brethren, with whom they live in perfect harmony." Here are the germs of that Methodism which ten years later originated the first Methodist society in New York, and in America. At the first Irish Conference Mr. Wesley suspected one of the preachers of a Calvinistic leading, of which, he observed, he had as great a dread as he had of the plague.

In 1758 Mr. Wesley again held a conference in Ireland, at which fourteen preachers were present; and though the record of its proceedings is compressed within a few lines, yet it is most satisfactory. In 1760 Mr. Wesley was again among the Palatines, when he "observed the ravages of emigration." How little did he then foresee what immense advantages would follow that emigration! else he would have used other words to describe the events he then witnessed.

Popish influence was unsparingly exercised to oppose the progress of Methodism in Ireland. Mobs continued to be gathered, assuming often frightful and perilous severity; while at other times Providence, in a remarkable manner, delivered the worshippers. Once at Clones, a popish rabble violently assaulted the Methodists in the market-place, when suddenly a veteran

Scotch military pensioner took his post by a tree in the market-place, musket in hand, declaring he would shoot the first man who disturbed the meeting. The terrible earnestness of the man awed the people into submission; and he kept guard there regularly for several weeks.

Ireland was helpful to America in more ways than historians record. Soon after the first society was formed in New York, Charles White and Richard Sause, two Dublin Methodists, arrived in New York; and they were liberal contributors to John Street Chapel. Some years afterwards Richard Sause recrossed the Atlantic, settled in London, and became one of the trustees of Mr. Wesley's chapel in the City Road, where he was interred.

Methodism won many converts from popery, as well as from the peasantry of Ireland. Mr. Wesley sent to that country some of the best preachers he had; and with untiring zeal they labored year by year, witnessing alternately vicissitudes and progress; but the root of Methodism was fixed in the soil, and there can be no doubt that it saved Protestantism in that country. In 1778 the two families of Embury and Heck, with another Irish family named Lawrence, removed to Canada, and they introduced Methodism into that country. In 1775 Lawrence Coughlan, another Irish Methodist, with two others, founded Methodism in the Norman isles; while Remington, another Irish Methodist, established Methodism in Newfoundland. Emigration has impoverished Methodism in every part of Ireland; but that emigration has resulted in an amount of extension which never could have been realized by other means. Methodism was often carried to and planted in the new homes of emigrants years before it would have reached them by invitation. Ireland has peculiar claims on those countries to which its emigrants have carried their religion. During Dr. McClintock's visit to his family homestead, in the County of Tyrone, Ireland, he went into a humble cabin inhabited by a poor widow. A friend introduced the doctor as from America. Instantly the aged widow's fading eye brightened as in her early days, and she said, instantly, "America? Ah, then, sir, do you know our Eliza?" That may be thought to be a simple question; but remembering that there is scarcely a homestead but has its representative in America, such sympathy is easily accounted for.

In 1789 Mr. Wesley presided for the last time at the Irish Conference, then composed mainly of Irishmen, those English preachers who had done such good service having been returned to their own Conference. Mr. Wesley's record is worthy to be transcribed. He says, "I never had between forty and fifty such preachers together in Ireland before, all of whom we have reason to hope are alive to God, and earnestly devoted to his service, men of sound experience, deep piety, and strong understanding." As if foreseeing his own death, Mr. Wesley sent Dr. Coke, in 1790, to hold the first Conference formally. Dr. Coke took that nomination as the yearly president of the Irish Conference, and he continued to occupy that position, in conjunction with John Crook and Dr. Adam Clarke, to the end of his life. In 1790 there were in Ireland 15 circuits, 67 preachers, and 14,000 members. No minutes were published of the early Irish conferences, apart from those of the English Methodists.

Historical accuracy makes it necessary to name an unpleasant dispute which arose in an informal conference held by Mr. Wesley in 1778, to consider and determine a dispute which had arisen among his societies in reference to the separation of the Methodists from the Church. The Rev. Edward Smythe had been driven from the Irish Church for his Methodist preaching. He had joined the Methodist ministry and had indiscreetly urged the need for separation from the Church. Mr. Wesley heard the arguments, but ruled that separation was not desirable. He visited Ireland more than twenty times, and nothing gave the Methodists there greater pleasure than to see him and to hear his voice. His last visit was attended by circumstances which were not of an encouraging nature. Dr. Coke had been using his utmost efforts to introduce Methodist services in church hours. This innovation was stoutly resisted by the leading laymen, of whom Mr. Arthur Keene and Mr. Richard D'Olier were the chief. They presented a memorial to Mr. Wesley against the action of Dr. Coke. Letters and memorials followed in quick succession, and Mr. Wesley determined against the proposed change, while Dr. Coke had a considerable following among the people of his way of thinking. The result was, before Mr. Wesley's death, a divided society in Dublin. After Mr. Wesley's death, Dr. Coke was able to urge his opinions with more determination, and they served to alienate from the doctor some of his dearest and best friends in Dublin, and the progress of the work of God was proportionably hindered. In 1790 Mr. Wesley was pleased to know that in Dublin he had one of the largest societies in his Connection, very few being larger.

Dr. Coke became the apostle of Ireland after the death of Wesley. He visited the country twenty-five times at his own cost; gave freely of his own money to the preachers and the new erections of chapels; travelled and preached all over the country; and the society advanced rapidly under his superintendence. In 1782, when he first presided at their Conference, they had only 15 circuits and 6000 members. In 1813, after a lapse of thirty-one years, there were 56 circuits and 28,770 members. All this was in spite of difficulties, persecutions, and resistance almost insurmountable. From 1795 to 1798, during the prevalence of the Rebellion, the sufferings and even tortures of the Methodists, perhaps the most loyal people in the country, were too horrible to relate. Their very loyalty caused the malignity of the rebels; but God was on their side, and had raised up among them two or three ministers whose labors saved the societies. Especially were the untiring labors of the Rev. Adam Averell made a great blessing to the whole country. Educated for the Church, after a few years' service in that body, he became a Methodist, and, having abundant means of his own, began to itinerate all over Ireland, much in the same way as Mr. Wesley had done, encouraging the members, administering the sacraments, attending and presiding over quarterly meetings, opening new chapels, and introducing Methodism into new localities. During half a century that devoted servant of God ceased not to exert all his energies and influence on behalf of Methodism, while he himself, like Wesley, as an ordained clergyman, was permitted occasionally to preach in churches, and without permission preached continuously, often daily, in the open air to listening multitudes. In those excursions which he made he witnessed many extraordinary manifestations of the divine power, both during his sermons and in prayer-meetings afterwards. During the twenty years of Dr. Coke's superintendence of Methodism in Ireland, Mr. Averell was generally appointed their representative to the English Conference, and for many years accompanied Dr. Coke from Ireland to England for that purpose, the two taking turns in preaching in the towns through which they passed on their journeys. When, in 1818, the Irish societies were divided on the sacrament and Church question, Mr. Averell took sides with those who formed "The Primitive Wesleyan Methodists," thought by some to be the seceders. He was appointed their president, organized their societies, established for them a magazine and book-room, and remained true to their society and interests till his death, Jan. 16, 1847, at the ripe age of ninety-two years.

Methodism, while struggling with poverty, opposition, and cruelty, yet was often favored in a remarkable manner by Divine Providence. At the time of the great Rebellion Methodism saved Dublin from being sacked by the rebels, whose intention to march on that city was secretly made known to a Methodist citizen. He at once communicated with the lord-lieutenant, who sent out the soldiers to meet the rebels, and they were defeated and the city saved. Dr. Coke came to Dublin, interceded with the authorities, found that Alexander Knox, Mr. Wesley's great friend, was private secretary to lord Castlereagh, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and through him obtained permission for the Conference to meet in Dublin, when by law more than five persons were forbidden to meet for any purpose, and secured safe-convoys for the preachers to travel. At that Conference it was resolved to establish home missions, in order to provide preaching for the people in their native language. The two missionaries first appointed were James M<sup>c</sup>Quigg and Charles Graham. The former was both a scholar and an able preacher. He toiled as a missionary till his health broke down, then devoted his energies to the preparation and editing of the Bible in the Irish tongue, which the British and Foreign Bible Society published. He brought out a second edition, and, while preparing a third edition for press, closed a career of toil and suffering, leaving behind, in that Irish Bible, a work which was a blessing to thousands after his death. Charles Graham was a man of dauntless Irish courage. At twenty-five his eyes were opened to see his lost condition. He had been both Churchman and papist, but, finding no soul-rest till he found Methodism, his character was soon discovered by Mr. Wesley, who sent him out as a missionary in Kerry County. Few of the Irish evangelists had more trials than Graham, and few knew better how to meet and conquer them. Bartley Campbell was another who had been an ardent papist, and became an eccentric but enthusiastic missionary. More extensively useful than any who had preceded him in mission work was Gideon Ouseley, who devoted a long life to spreading divine truth in the form of Methodism among the Irish people. The Life and Labors of that eminent preacher and defender of truth, by the Rev. William Arthur, has perpetuated his character and work. He and Graham often travelled together and assisted each other; but Ouseley will always be considered the chief Methodist Irish missionary, which position he occupied for forty years. He labored as hard with his pen as his tongue, and his writings, when published, were at times more helpful to the cause of God than his verbal utterances. The improved religious character of Ireland now is largely due to Gideon Ouseley's labors.

Ireland, however, was not to be so much benefited by these labors as other countries. Methodism would have been mighty in that country had not emigration, continuing year by year for half a century, deprived it of thousands of its Methodist converts. In fifteen years fully ten thousand members were reported at successive conferences as having emigrated to America. Nor was this the only drawback to the progress of the work. In 1801 the English Conference, unable to meet the claims of its own societies, and having to borrow money to sustain its own agencies, was obliged to discontinue the pecuniary assistance it had cheerfully rendered the Irish Conference. Dr. Coke immediately visited Ireland. To provide for that emergency a fund of £1200 was raised by special effort, out of which the debts were paid, and a book-room established as a means to raise money. The institution was of great utility to the cause; but instead of being financially helpful, money had to be borrowed to keep it going, and soon the debts were £8000, the interest on which absorbed all the public collection on behalf of the book-room. The preachers taxed themselves yearly for many years to reduce the debt. Their difficulties from limited resources continued nearly twenty years, and after the division in the society in 1818, the burden on the Irish preachers became so oppressive that the English Conference generously granted them £600 a year from the contingent fund. Still the debt was not cancelled, and in 1828 the Irish preachers again taxed themselves, and by a special effort raised £1850 towards clearing off the £8000 still remaining of debt. During the year following the people raised £7200, so the debt was cancelled. But who can tell the sacrifices the preachers had to make to raise that sum in maintenance of their several agencies? During sixteen years they almost staggered under heavy financial burdens, but they slackened not in their devotion for the salvation of their benighted countrymen.

The great trouble of the Methodists in Ireland was the sacramental question. Unlike their English brethren, they were barely content with their position as a society without full church privileges. When the English Methodists agitated for and obtained permission in 1797 for their ministers to administer the sacraments, the Irish, having Dr. Coke and Mr. Averell so frequently with them to administer the sacraments, did not claim for their preachers generally their full pastoral rights. After the death of Dr. Coke the members in society had so often to be taken either to Church or to the Presbyterians for the sacraments, according to the leaning of the preacher, that they became greatly dissatisfied, and in 1816 there arose a strong determination in the minds of many of the people to have the sacraments from their own ministers. There was also another party equally determined to abide by the old rule and go to Church for the ordinances. For more than two years the contention continued, both parties being equally determined to have their own way. The Rev. Adam Averell had long been the apostle of the Irish Methodists, travelling constantly among them, giving his money, relieving their sufferings, directing their official meetings, and administering the sacraments. Several thousands resolved to adhere to the old plan, and at the Conference of 1816, Dr. Adam Clarke presiding, the Rev. Adam Averell and Mr. Tobias were the chief speakers—the former for, the latter against, continuing the old plan. Throughout the societies the people were divided, and in the autumn of 1816 a Conference was held at Clones of those representatives who favored the old plan. Through hope of avoiding a separation, there was too much hesitation and deliberation. In 1817 two conferences were held, the second one at Clones, presided over by Mr. Averell, who was unanimously chosen their president. The main body of the preachers voted for the sacraments; the party led by Mr. Averell maintained the original plan. In January, 1818, a meeting of representatives of circuits was held at Clones, when those who adhered to Mr. Averell and primitive custom resolved on a form of general principles, and formed the Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Society. They were not a Church; their preachers claimed no ministerial rank, assumed no ministerial titles, and performed no proper ministerial functions. They preached to the people, and led them to other churches for the ordinances. In that uncertain condition they certainly prospered for a time, and during 1818 over two thousand members were added to them, and in 1819 over four thousand additions were made. This section of the original society was led by Mr. Averell during the rest of his protracted life. In years following they maintained their separate condition amid various vicissitudes, and for just sixty years they endured hardships and privations greater than they need have done. Happily they came to an end at the Conference of 1878. In the address from the Irish to the English Conference of that year is this record, "This Conference has been notable for the consummation of the union with the Primitive Wesleyan Society, so long under consideration. The final discussion of the subject was marked by great thoroughness and good feeling, and the decision arrived at with a hearty unanimity. When the two conferences came together it was a time long to be remembered, and it was evident to all that the spirit of God was eminently in their midst. The only breach which has occurred in Irish Methodism was thus healed."

The parent society was known for some time as the Sacramentarians, because the preachers had voted themselves to the privilege of administering the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper—a privilege they ought to have had from the first. The vote carried with it an immense amount of pecuniary loss and hardship. During the four years of the struggle (1814–18), an annual decrease of members was reported, and in 1817 no less than 7500 retired; but in 1819 they had an increase of over 3500, and the Separatists had an increase of over 4000, so that neither party could complain of apparent want of success. The greatest hindrance to prosperity was the continued emigration from Ireland to America, by which for many years the society lost not less than a thousand members annually. The yearly visits as presidents of their Conference of such preachers as Dr. Adam Clarke, Richard Reece, Richard Watson, Dr. Bunting, Robert Newton, and other leading ministers from England, greatly encouraged the patient toilers. Their financial privations were very great; but they labored most energetically, though it was up-hill work all the way; yet in 1839, the centenary year, they numbered over 150 preachers and more than 26,000 members. During the same year they contributed £14,500 to the Centenary Fund. That liberality in their poverty was marvellous, and shows the spirit of self-denial which animated them all. In addition to all this effort, they established schools in Dublin, Cork, and Belfast, and, aided by the munificent contributions of American Methodists, they built and established a Methodist College at Belfast. The Wesleyan Connexion School in Dublin, opened in 1845, was to secure to Methodists in the South a high-class education. The college in Belfast, opened in August, 1868, combines both a public-school and college. In the former, boys are prepared for a collegiate course of training; and in the college two classes of students are received—one consisting of candidates for the ministry, the other those intended for commercial pursuits. Undergraduates of the Queen's University also attend its classes of instruction.

There have been heroic men in their ranks, who have fought and labored with marvellous zeal and energy. Charles Graham was a gray-headed veteran of seventy-four years, who died in triumph in April, 1824. William Hamilton broke down in 1816, but he ceased not to labor until October, 1843, when he closed a ministerial career of fifty-six years, aged eighty-two. Gideon Ouseley was abroad preaching out-of-doors at seventy-four, active as ever, and delivering twenty sermons in the week. He died a victor's death, in Dublin, May 14, 1839, aged seventy-eight. To these may be added Richard Boardman, James Morgan, Andrew Blair, James M'Mullen, John M'Adam, Thomas Barber (who sent Adam Clarke into the ministry), Lanktree, Tobias, Stewart, Waugh, and others. Besides these, how many Methodists from Ireland have entered the ministry both in England and America—such men as Henry Moore, Adam Clarke, William Thompson, Walter Griffith, and William Arthur, all of whom were presidents of both the English and the Irish Conference, and the transplanting of whom impoverished the Church which reared them! Think also of the ministers from Ireland now in America! But these we have not space to name. Irish Methodists have helped to found their denomination in America, Canada, Australia, Africa, and India; and while thus helping others everywhere with their best men, they were left to struggle on, in their own land, with but little help from any but themselves. Irish Methodists have a roll of honor which will never be surpassed in the Church militant; and in the Church triumphant none will receive greater commendation than those whose names have been given, and hundreds of others who were their collaborators and joint sufferers. Rev. William Crook, D.D., has a copious history of Irish Methodism nearly ready for publication.

In 1877, as a preparation for the union with the Irish Primitive Wesleyans, the Irish Methodist Conference first admitted laymen to participate with the ministers in the Annual Conference. This act of grace was done in Ireland one year before it was adopted by the English Conference. In 1878 the Primitive Wesleyan Conference came in a body to the Conference of the parent society, and both united to form one community, after having had a separate existence for just sixty years. The highest number of members the Irish Conference ever had at one time was in the year 1814, when the agitation commenced for the sacraments. That year the membership was 29,388. The year 1818, when the separation took place, they were reduced to 19,052. The society never fully rallied from the shock that division caused. In 1844, when in their divided state, the parent society numbered 28,409; but having to struggle against the continued drain arising from emigration, when the two societies were united in 1878, they only reached a total of 25,487 members, and at the present time they are below that number. A careful examination of the statistics of the body will enable the reader to understand the difficulty of the preachers in laboring against such varied discouraging forces. The disruption which took place in England in 1849 reached Ireland in its paralyzing influence, and the Irish Conference, which in 1849 had a membership of 22,000, in 1855 had been reduced to a little over 18,000. The highest number of members reported by the Irish Conference during the thirty years following 1849 was only 23,500 in the year 1861.

III. Literature.—But few of the Irish Methodist preachers, as such, have had either leisure or disposition to make free use of the press. Some preachers who left Ireland and joined the English Conference have written and published extensively. Dr. Adam Clarke, Henry Moore, William Arthur, A.M., William Myles, and James Creighton have each left their names permanently in the annals of English literature. With two or three exceptions, the literature of Ireland has not been much enriched by the preachers; not from want of ability, but owing to more pressing duties.

Rev. W. P. Appelbee, LL.D., has published three pamphlets: one on The Genuineness and Authenticity of Holy Scripture:—one Calvinism Not the Theology of the Bible:—and A Vindication of the Wesleyan Catechism.

Rev. George Alley has published Our Class Meetings, Their Scriptural Authority and Practical Working (1868, 136 pp.).

Rev. J. C. Bass has published a poem, Life's True Beatitude; or, Who is Wise?—also, Glimpses in America.

Rev. Robert G. Cather, LL.D., made very free use of his pen in newspapers, as secretary of the Systematic Benevolence Society.

Rev. G. W. Campbell, A.M., has become widely known by his Life of the Rev. Charles Graham, published in 1868 as The Apostle of Kerry (8vo, 324 pp.).

Rev. William Crook, D.D., is the most prominent author now in connection with the Conference. He has published, Funeral Services, on the death of his father:—Christian Consolation in Relation to the Dead in Christ, a sermon for W. H. Barkin:—The Memory of our Fathers, sermon on the death of John Nelson:—Our Heavenly Home, sermon for John Carey:—Paradise; or, The Present State of the Holy Deal, a sermon:—Lay Preaching in Ireland, and the New Gospel:—Ireland, and the Centenary of American Methodism, an octavo volume of 263 pages. He has in press a History of Methodism in Ireland (in 2 vols.). He has also been the editor of the Irish Evangelist for many years.

Rev. John Dwyer has published Christian Thoroughness, a memorial of T. A. Shillington, Esq., of Portadown.

Rev. Thomas Pearson is the author of, The Irish of the Irish Church, published anonymously, and a work of deep research:—The Bible and Temperance; or, The True Scriptural Basis of the Temperance Movement. This is one of the most exhaustive works on the wines of the Bible, an octavo volume of 296 pages issued in 1881.

Rev. William Reilly has published A Memorial of the Ministerial Life of the Rev. Gideon Ouseley, Irish Missionary. The Rev. William Arthur has also published a Life of Gideon Ouseley.

Mr. Ouseley himself was the author of thirty-four separate publications, with his name attached. They were chiefly letters of a controversial character, which were clear, powerful, and convincing; and were of immense service, when published, in opposing the spread of popery, and in defending Methodist agency in Ireland. The two principal works published by Mr. Ouseley were, Old Christianity against Papal Novelties, an octavo volume of 446 pages:—and Calvinism—Arminianism (1831, 18mo, 220 pp.).

Rev. George Vance has published a pamphlet, Calvinism Not the Theology of the Bible.

Rev. Samuel Weir, in 1867, published a small volume, 18mo, Onward to God.

Rev. G. E. Wedgwood has published a lecture entitled Liberty. (G. J. S.)

(Wesleyan) Methodist New Connection, a body of English Independents which separated from the regular Wesleyans on questions of ecclesiastical polity.

I. Origin.—The opinion has been held, and is still prevalent in some localities, that the Methodist New Connection had its origin in personal sympathy with Alexander Kilham. Such is not the fact. Most of those who joined the body at its origin were influenced by the publications and public addresses of Mr. Kilham, but the Connection as such originated in principle, not in sympathy. The Methodist New Connection was originated by a contest for the establishment of the following important and scriptural principles:

1. The right of the people to hold their public religious worship at such hours as were most convenient, without their being restricted to the mere intervals of the hours appointed for service in the Established Church.

2. The right of the people to receive the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper from the hands of their own ministers and in their own places of worship.

3. The right of the people to a representation in the district meetings and in the annual conference, and thereby to participate in the government of the community and in the appropriation of its funds.

4. The right of the Church to have a voice, through its local business meetings, in the reception and expulsion of members, the choice of local officers, and in the calling-out of candidates for the ministry.

Not any of these privileges were originally enjoyed in the parent body; they were for years zealously contended for by the fathers and founders of the New Connection; and when they could not be fully obtained, conscience compelled those men to secede from the parent community and originate a distinct denomination in which such scriptural privileges could be freely enjoyed.

The power of Mr. Wesley was absolute, but it fell into his hands unsought and undesired. It was exercised by him with affection, and solely for the best interests of his societies; and retained from the same motive. He was the father of the community, and was necessitated for a time to be its sole director and governor; but, however proper it was for him to exercise that power during the infancy of the Connection, yet, when surrounded by churches which had grown to maturity, and assisted by ministers and laymen of acknowledged wisdom, integrity, and piety, whose existence and happiness, like his own, were bound up with the prosperity of Methodism, it would have been more conformable to the example of the apostles and the dictates of sound reason to have gradually relaxed his hold of the reins and admitted others to a participation of the same, and finally to have framed a liberal constitution defining the prerogatives of the ministry and the privileges of the people, securing both by suitable regulations and wholesome laws. Mr. Wesley's mind was well qualified for this, but he did it not. He retained absolute power until death; and, instead of framing for the community a liberal constitution, he transferred by legal settlement his own power to the preachers, and made that law which before was only custom, and custom arising from the peculiar relation in which he stood. He made those his successors in absolute power who could not possibly be his successors in paternal relation and influence. That exercise of power was the subject of many remarks and adverse criticism. Just fifty years after the origin of Methodism Mr. Wesley had to defend his conduct in this matter, which he did in these words:

"Some of our helpers say, 'This is shackling free-born Englishmen;' and they demand a free conference, that is, a meeting of all the preachers, wherein all things shall be determined by most votes. I answer, It is possible after my death something of this kind may take place, but not while I live. To me the preachers have engaged themselves to submit, to serve me as sons in the Gospel; but they are not thus engaged to any man or number of men besides. To me the people in general will submit, but they will not thus submit to any other."

When Mr. Wesley died, in 1791, only two years after he had written and published the above observations, there were 380 preachers in his society, some with active, others passive, dispositions. Among the former were some who were of opinion that, being the regularly appointed ministers of their congregations, they ought to exercise all the functions which belong to the pastoral office; but to be deprived of the privilege of administering the sacraments was felt by some of the preachers to be a great hardship, while the laymen, many of them, considered they had a just right to representation in the properly constituted Church courts.

Mr. Alexander Kilham, one of the preachers who had been specially privileged in his ministerial career, was one of the most able and courageous advocates of what was considered the full rights and liberties of both preachers and people. In 1792 he published an address to the Newcastle Society, to whom he was then ministering, advocating liberal views. His address met with favor from Dr. Coke, Messrs. Bradburn, Pawson, Moore, Taylor, Crowther, Bramwell, and others. The Church party among the preachers resisted strongly, and the controversy spread and intensified. Mr. Kilham, impressed with the conviction that permanent peace would never be established in the body until such a constitution was adopted as secured to the people New-Test. rights and privileges, felt it a duty to make another effort for the attainment of this important object. Under this impression he wrote a pamphlet entitled The Progress of Liberty. In this work he adverted to the course of Mr. Wesley in the progress of Methodism, showing that he had acted from time to time as altered circumstances required; he glanced at the alterations which had been effected since Mr. Wesley's death, and analyzed "the Articles of Pacification," pointing out their defects, etc. In the second part of this work he lays down the "Outlines of a Constitution," which he humbly proposes to the consideration of "The People called Methodists." This outline embraces the following particulars:

First, That instead of the preachers having the sole power to admit and expel members, these acts should be done with consent of the people.

Second, That the members should have a voice in choosing their own leaders.

Third, That local preachers, instead of being appointed by the circuit preacher, should be examined and approved by the leaders' and quarterly meetings; with which meetings also should rest the power of receiving and dismissing them.

Fourth, That as it was impossible to allow the people to choose their own ministers on account of the itinerant plan, yet the quarterly meetings should have a voice in recommending preachers to travel.

Fifth, That lay delegates appointed by the quarterly meetings should attend the district meetings.

And, lastly, he proposes, "with submission to the preachers and the Connection at large, to appoint one or two lay delegates from every district meeting to attend the Conference."

Such were the propositions of Mr. Kilham, and such were the principles adopted as elements of the constitution of the New Connection at its origin, and such remain its essential and distinguishing features at the present day. Many of them have since been substantially adopted in the other Methodist bodies. Nevertheless, for publishing the pamphlet advocating these principles of freedom, Mr. Kilham was tried and expelled from the ministry at the ensuing conference (1796). Being left without a circuit, Mr. Kilham published a detailed account of his trial and expulsion, which sold extensively and was read eagerly. It created a strong feeling of sympathy towards the expelled, who was welcomed in many circuits to preach to and address the people. Several large societies expressed their adhesion to the principles Mr. Kilham advocated, and in May, 1797, a chapel was purchased in Leeds, where he gathered large congregations and preached to them.

The Methodist Conference of 1797 was occupied during its session with the altered circumstances arising from their refusal of the liberties which had been asked by deputations from the people. A Plan of Pacification was drawn up and published by the Conference, which was one of the most important proceedings connected with the history of Methodism. As, however, that plan did not concede all that the people desired, three of the preachers resigned—William Thom, Stephen Eversfield, and Alexander Cummins—and united with Mr. Kilham. These brethren, with a number of delegates from the people, met together in Ebenezer Chapel, Leeds, on Aug. 9, 1797, when Mr. Thom was elected president and Mr. Kilham secretary, and the basis of a constitution was adopted in conformity with the principles which had been publicly advocated. The full development and formal statement of these principles were reserved until the ensuing conference. The most important places in which friends declared for the New Itinerancy were Alnwick, Ashton, Bolton, Chester, Hanley, Leeds, Liverpool, Macclesfield, Manchester, Nottingham, Newcastle, and Stockport, which became the nuclei of distinct circuits, consisting altogether of over 5000 members.

II. Doctrines.—The Methodist New Connection has a creed; the doctrines it teaches are Arminian, purely Methodist. No written creed was considered necessary at the time the Connection was commenced, its founders being all Methodists who held by Mr. Wesley's writings; they retained his hymn-book, and avowed their unabated attachment to the doctrines he taught. False reports on this head having been circulated in the early years, the Conference of 1800 made a specific declaration of their doctrines, which were briefly summed up under the following heads: namely, first, the fall of man; second, redemption by the death of Christ; third, justification by faith; fourth, the complete sanctification of believers; fifth, perseverance in the divine life, or the necessity of continuing in faith and good works to the end, in order to final salvation.

The Conference of 1816 reviewed the whole question of doctrines, and embodied them in twelve articles or propositions, with Scripture references to each. These are the same as those held by the parent society.

III. Church Organization and Polity.—The founders of the Methodist New Connection renounced all connection with the Established Church, and as avowed Dissenters added the administration of the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper to the regular duties of the ministry, and laid down as fundamental this principle: "That the Church itself is entitled, either collectively, in the persons of its members, or representatively, by persons chosen out of and by itself, to a voice and influence in all the acts of legislation and government." That principle is embodied in the entire system of government of the Connection. This will be seen from the following statement of the constitution and functions of the official meetings, briefly summed up under five heads.

1. Conference.—This is held annually, and is composed of an equal number of preachers and laymen, each circuit sending one of its preachers and one of its lay members. When only one representative is sent, the circuit selects a preacher and layman in alternate years. Should any circuit be unable to send a representative, a letter accompanied by the required documents, details, and collections is sufficient. The treasurer of the Connection, the corresponding member of the annual committee, the steward and treasurer of the book-room, the general secretary of the missions, the superintendent of the Irish mission, a deputed minister or layman, alternately, from the Irish Conference, and the guardians of the Connection, under the deed executed in 1846, are, by virtue of office, members of Conference, without interfering in any way with the privilege of the circuits in which such individuals may reside. The business of Conference is to make laws for the government of the Connection; to decide impartially on charges affecting the character of preachers or other officers, and on appeals referred to it by the quarterly meetings; to disburse the various funds of the Connection; to station the preachers for the year ensuing; to investigate the condition of each circuit; to adjust differences, and to promote, by friendly co-operation and advice, harmony and love throughout the community; and to devise and put into operation means for the more extensive spread of the Gospel both at home and abroad. Its sittings are open to members of the Connection, subject to the judgment of the president.

In addition to the above, a committee of seven persons is chosen at each Conference, by ballot, to transact the business of the Connection between one Conference and another; four of the members are preachers and three are laymen, one year, and vice versa the following year. It is the duty of this committee to see that the resolutions of Conference are carried into effect; to give advice in all matters of dispute and difficulty, and to make provision for such circuits as may through death, new openings, or other causes, need supplies during the ecclesiastical year. A report of its proceedings is prepared by the corresponding member, and annually presented to Conference.

2. District Meetings.—These meetings are composed of all the circuit preachers in the district, with an equal number of laymen (including the representatives to the last Conference), who are elected by the respective quarterly meetings. These meetings are designed to form and carry out plans for the revival of the work of God in the district; to investigate the condition of the societies, chapels, and Sabbath-schools, and to prepare correct returns of the number of members, probationers, Sabbath-school teachers and scholars, etc., for the use of Conference; to ascertain the amount raised in each circuit for the different Connectional funds; to investigate all claims on the yearly collection and chapel fund; to receive applications for the division of circuits; to examine candidates for the ministry; to lay before the district any resolution of the Conference affecting the circuits, and to ascertain whether they have been carried into full effect. These meetings are designed and calculated to shorten the duration of Conference, to strengthen the executive, to secure more correct information on points of local interest than can be done at a greater distance, and to afford a legitimate channel through which many evils may be altogether prevented or speedily rectified.

3. Quarterly Meetings.—These are held in each circuit, and are composed of the circuit preachers, the circuit stewards, the secretary of the local preachers, and representatives of the people chosen from the local preachers, leaders, trustees (being members), and other experienced persons from the different societies. Each society sends one or more representatives according to the number of its members. Any member of society has free admission to the quarterly meetings, with liberty to give his opinion, but without the power to vote. It is the business of the quarterly meeting to pay the preachers' salaries; to determine the amount that each society is to contribute for the support of the ministry; to make by-laws for its own regulation and for the management of the circuit, providing they do not contravene the rules of the Connection; to appoint persons to make the preachers' plans for the circuit; to recommend local preachers to be taken into the regular ministry; to determine respecting the qualifications of candidates for the local ministry, and to examine and decide upon the affairs, both temporal and spiritual, of the circuit generally.

4. Leaders' Meetings.—These consist of leaders, society stewards, one or more of the circuit preachers, a male representative for each of the female and circuit preachers' classes, and a representative from the trustees of the chapel, provided such representative be a member of society. Leaders' meetings are held weekly, or once a fortnight, and regulate the affairs of each society and place of worship. It is the province of these meetings to inspect the class-books, and to receive the weekly or other payments; to inquire after the sick or absent members, that they may be visited; to determine on notices for the pulpit; to fix the hours for public worship, and appoint the times for making the collections for its support; to recommend persons to act as exhorters or local preachers; to judge and decide upon the fitness of candidates for Church membership; to ascertain whether any members are walking disorderly; and prayerfully to devise plans for the advancement of the work of God, and for the general improvement of the society.

5. Local Preachers' Meetings.—These are held previously to the circuit quarterly meetings, and are composed of the circuit and local preachers. Their business is, in addition to mutual counsel and encouragement, to consider the recommendations given by the leaders' meetings of persons to be employed as local preachers or exhorters; make suitable inquiries respecting probationers, and any alleged irregularities in the conduct or preaching of any of the brethren; ascertain if any alterations are required in the places or times of preaching, and report thereon to the quarterly meeting through the medium of their secretary.

The religious, social, and society meetings of the New Connection are conducted in the same manner as the like meetings of the Wesleyan body, the parent society.

IV. History.—The incidents of history in the Methodist New Connection are comparatively few, and they relate chiefly to the personal history of the preachers and the steady spread of the movement. At the first Conference the number of adherents was five thousand and thirty-seven. Surrounded by difficulties of more than ordinary urgency and gravity, the society made very slow progress, not so much from want of sympathy on the part of the people as from want of funds and agents to commence new circuits. The new itinerancy commenced with seven circuits and seven preachers. In 1798 seven other preachers entered the ministry—Messrs. W. Haslam, W. Styan, John Revil, Charles Donald, W. Driver, G. Wall, and John McClure. That fact inspired cheerful hopes of progress, but in five years only two hundred and forty-three additions were made to the membership. A monthly magazine was commenced in 1798, which has been continued ever since. The first and second conferences were presided over by Mr. William Thom, the secretary being Mr. Kilham. The Conference of 1799 was presided over by John Grindell, the secretary being Mr. Robert Hall, of Nottingham, a holy man, and a generous supporter of the cause. In December of the previous year the first heavy blow and discouragement came by the unexpected death of Mr. Kilham; many were disheartened, and some among Mr. Wesley's followers were glad, they viewing the occurrence as a judgment upon him personally. All the surrounding circumstances, calmly considered apart from prejudice, show that Mr. Kilham's death was more the result of earnest overwork and exposure in bad weather. Viewed from any human standpoint, the premature death of that able minister was much to be regretted, and the good work for which he lived and labored was considerably retarded by the occurrence. Exactly two months after Mr. Kilham's death, the Connection suffered another serious loss by the death of their very liberal and zealous layman, Mr. William Smith, of Hanley, who expired peacefully Feb. 20, 1799. He had been brought up in Mr. Wesley's society, but his sympathies were with Mr. Kilham, whom he visited at Nottingham, Dec. 19, 1798. He was born at Walsall, Staffordshire, in December, 1763; was religiously brought up; frequently preached as occasion offered; attended the first Conference of the New Connection; opened his house at Hanley for preaching, and soon afterwards had a chapel erected there, which became the central home of one of the largest and most prosperous societies in the Connection.

The Conference of 1799 recognised a society in Ireland, and the Rev. John McClure commenced a cause at Lisburn. The same year the few preachers then associated agreed to contribute ten shillings and sixpence yearly to found a fund for the support of aged ministers.

The Conference of 1803 commenced what is known as the Paternal Fund. It is sustained by public collections in the chapels and private subscriptions. Allowances are made from it towards the support of the children of the preachers in their early years. The Beneficent Fund was originated at the same Conference by Mr. Samuel Higginbottom, of Manchester, who gave fifty pounds as a benefaction, and became the first treasurer of the fund. The resources are obtained from public collections and subscriptions, and its objects are the relief of aged and infirm ministers and their widows. In 1880 the Paternal Fund produced £2698; the Beneficent Fund, £5303.

The year 1804 was made memorable by the celebrated Rev. Richard Watson joining the ranks of the New Connection. He travelled for eight years in that body, and they claim the honor of bringing that extraordinary man out of obscurity. Two of the sermons in his published works were first preached in New Connection chapels. During his itinerancy with them he was a member of the Annual Committee, and three times secretary of the Conference. Dr. Bunting reintroduced him into the Wesleyan body, but he ever held in very high esteem his brethren in the New Connection.

In 1808 the law was made which requires preachers, at the end of their probation, to answer in public questions relating to their religious experience, call to the ministry, their doctrinal views, etc.

It will be instructive to the present race of Methodists to read the financial conditions on which Methodist preachers consented in 1812 to devote themselves wholly to the ministry. Serious complaints had been made respecting the inadequacy of the income of the preachers to meet their necessities. A committee was appointed by the Conference of 1812 to examine and report thereon. After a candid consideration of the subject, it was resolved that, in addition to the use of a house and furniture at the expense of the circuit, every married preacher in full connection should receive, for himself and wife, £12 per quarter; "not less than £2 per quarter for a servant;" and, in addition to these items, "not less than 14s. per week for board." The allowance from the Paternal Fund for boys under eight years of age, and for girls under twelve, to be £6 per annum; then they retire from the fund. Charge for medical attendance and travelling expenses are to be paid by the quarterly meeting. Considerable uneasiness and anxiety was felt in many parts of the Connection in the years 1814-16 with regard to the legal safety of some of the chapels which had belonged to the parent society before the year 1797. Those anxieties were not favorable to the spread of the word of God.

In 1818 a Home Mission was established to introduce Methodism into new localities. The sum of £424 was given by the circuits to aid that mission. In 1824 the mission was relinquished, and Ireland was selected as the place on which to concentrate their efforts, and one of the English preachers was appointed to superintend the work. It has continued with varying success to the present time. In 1880 there were seven stations in Ireland, with a total membership of 715, being only an average of 102 members per station. The home missionary operations were resumed some years afterwards, and in 1880 they occupied eleven stations in England, with a membership of 1249, and for their support the circuits contributed £1158 during the year 1879-80.

In 1823 the general rules of the Connection were considered, amended, and published, with the sanction of the Conference.

The same Conference ordered the publication of a monthly magazine for Sunday scholars at the price of 2d. The Conference of 1827 ordered the publication of a Catechism for the use of children, which was prepared by the Rev. Abraham Scott. A larger Catechism for the use of elder children was written by the Rev. William Cooke, D.D., and published about the year 1848. The same minister is preparing a new and enlarged edition of that Catechism to be published in 1881.

A Connectional magazine was commenced in January, 1798, at the price of 6d. monthly. It has been continued to the present time. To promote the circulation of these several publications, a book-room and an editor were indispensable. The former was located at Hanley from 1798 to 1832, when it was removed to Manchester. In 1827 the Rev. W. Shuttleworth was appointed editor and steward, and the business rapidly advanced. In 1827 the capital stock amounted to £1305, and the annual profits to £113. Five years afterwards the capital was £2500, and the yearly profits over £500, while the magazine was greatly improved; the third series was commenced in 1833. In 1844 it was found expedient to remove the book-room to London, where it has since remained, and the Rev. John Bakewell was appointed editor. In 1848 the Rev. William Cooke, the eminent theologian and divine, was the editor of the magazine, and in that capacity and as book-steward he has rendered more valuable service to the Connection than any other minister. The Rev. Charles Dewick Ward, D.D., was appointed editor and book-steward in 1880; the capital stock that year was £2980, and the profits £248.

The Methodist hymn-book had been used in the New Connection from 1797. In the year 1834 a new hymn-book was prepared and published, which was intended more as a source of profit to the Connection than as a superior book to the one which it supplanted. This also was displaced by another and very much improved collection, including 1024 hymns, compiled chiefly by the Rev. Henry Piggis, and published in May, 1863. It was at that time the best collection in use in any branch of the great Methodist family. Its marked superiority soon led to the preparation of other improved and enlarged collections for the use of "the People called Methodists."

The years 1836 and 1837 were periods of unrest in many Methodist societies, owing to the trial and expulsion of the Rev. Dr. Warren from the Wesleyan body. At Dudley and Stourbridge large numbers left the Wesleyans and joined the New Connection, adding greatly to their influence and usefulness in those towns. An effort was made to bring all those who had left the parent society into union with the New Connection; but some of the Separatists made such radical changes in the constitution a condition of joining that the New Connection decided not to make such concessions, though many changes were made. Those who did not unite with this body formed themselves into a new branch of the Methodist family, known for some years as the Wesleyan Association. They afterwards relinquished most of those extreme views which prevented their proposed union.

The year 1841 was a painfully memorable one to the New Connection, owing to the necessary expulsion of two of the ministers, J. Barker and W. Trotter. Joseph Barker had used his position to advocate low socialist and infidel opinions. Much mischief was done, for twenty-nine societies, including 4348 members, were lost to the Connection. After trying his new doctrines for some years, he found out the delusion into which he had fallen, returned to the Christian faith, and endeavored to the uttermost to undo the mischief he had done. He is said to have joined the Primitive Methodists; wrote and published his autobiography in 1869, in which he recanted all his errors; was reconciled to most of his former brethren in the New Connection; and died in 1879 (or 1880) a penitent Christian. It was not until 1855, fourteen years afterwards, that the number of members in society reached the total at which they stood at the date of Mr. Barker's expulsion. A small work was published in 1841 entitled The Beacon, and also some tracts by the Rev. W. Cooke, D.D., which prevented the breach becoming wider than it otherwise would have been. The Connection suffered greater losses through Mr. Barker's unfaithfulness and treachery than from any other cause in its whole history of over eighty years. The financial difficulties of the Connection became so great and oppressive that in 1842 nearly £900 were collected to lessen them, £840 more in 1843, and the Conference of that year ordered a special collection to be made through the circuit, which secured £5000 more towards the same object.

The Conference of 1837 originated a mission in Canada, which became a great blessing to that country. Mr. William Ridgway, one of the leading New Connection laymen, having visited that locality, made such representations of the claims of Canada for the Gospel that the Rev. John Addyman became the pioneer missionary there. He was joined two years afterwards by the Rev. Henry Only Crofts, D.D. Mr. Addyman still survives, having been in the ministry forty-eight years. Dr. Crofts entered into rest in the year 1880. The Canadian mission was a success; but a few years ago, in 1875, it was united to the other branches of Methodism in Canada, in order to make one large undivided Methodist Church in that dominion.

The jubilee of the New Connection was a time of great rejoicing. The Jubilee Conference was held at Manchester, the Rev. Thomas Allin presiding. The sittings commenced June 1, 1846. The first important special business done was the final consideration and adoption of a deed-poll, which provides for the security of the property of the Connection, the preservation of its doctrines, and the continuance of its principles and discipline. By the deed-poll a legal identity is given to the Connection in the persons of twenty-four guardian representatives—twelve ministers and twelve laymen—whose names are inserted in the deed, with provisions for filling up the vacancies that will necessarily occur. The attendance of six of the guardian representatives is requisite to legalize the Conference. After its adoption, the deed-poll was executed by every member of the Conference; and it has since been duly enrolled in the High Court of Chancery. A model trust-deed, and a form of conveyance of freehold land for Connectional chapels, schools, and parsonages, were also decided upon; and a book-room deed also agreed to, each of them adapted to the deed-poll.

At the end of fifty years, the number of members in the Connection was only 20,002, namely—in England, 15,610; Ireland, 932; Canada, 3460.

It was resolved to raise a Jubilee Fund of not less than £20,000, but the result was only £7721. Towards that fund there was raised in 1847 £2829; in 1848, £1567; in 1849, £3402. About £5100 was voted to remove chapel debts, £1300 to promote missions; and various sums were given or loaned to the Paternal Fund, the Beneficent Fund for a theological college, for aged ministers, and to lessen other financial burdens which fettered the agencies of the Church. On June 5 a jubilee tea-meeting was held in the Free-Trade Hall, Manchester, which was attended by more than four thousand persons. Several important schemes for the extension of the work, which it was hoped the fund would enable the Connection to undertake, could not be commenced for want of finances. One result, however, was attained, which will be a permanent memorial. The Revs. Thomas Allin, William Cooke, Samuel Hulme, and Philip James Wright conjointly wrote a jubilee volume, which had a reasonable sale, and which chronicles much important and valuable information, both historical and biographical, relating to the Connection during the previous fifty years. From that work many facts in the notices preceding are obtained. Baggaly's Digest and the Minutes of Conferences supply the details which follow.

At the Conference of 1848 arrangements were made for the establishment of home missions in England; but the work grew slowly, and ten years afterwards, in 1857, a plan was adopted for the management of home mission chapels. In 1865 the present Home Missionary Society was inaugurated. In 1880 there were thirteen mission stations, with 1249 members.

Although the Jubilee Fund had been of much use in relieving the Connection of some financial burdens, yet great embarrassment was felt in many places from inadequate funds in 1849, and at the following Conference a plan was adopted which entirely extinguished the debts of the Connection at that time.

In 1851 the Methodist societies in England were in a very painful state of unrest, owing to the expulsion in 1849 from the Wesleyan Conference of several prominent preachers—the Revs. James Everett, Samuel Dunn, William Griffith, James Bromley, Thomas Rowland, and others. Although in three years more than one hundred thousand members were separated from the parent society, very few of them were attracted to the New Connection. In 1851, 1853, and 1854 this body had to report to each Conference a decrease, which was a source of much anxiety and solicitude, and a special service of humiliation before God was held at the Conference of 1853. In 1851 overtures were made from the Wesleyan delegates—the seceders from the parent society—towards union with the New Connection, but no union took place. In 1854 an effort was made to change the name of New Connection, as it was not then new, and many thought the name was a hindrance to others uniting with them. It was, however, resolved by the Conference of that year not to change the name, as the new deed-poll had only been adopted a few years. The rules of the Connection were revised in 1854.

The Manchester Conference of 1859 was memorable for the establishment of a mission to China. From a conviction that the encouragement of foreign missions would not hinder home work, that step was taken. The Rev. William Cooke was the president, and by his genial advocacy a successful work was commenced in that country, which in 1880 reported 43 chapels, 27 societies, and 902 members, under the superintendence of the Rev. John Innocent, who is the principal of a training institution in China. In 1862 a mission was established in Australia, which has but two societies at present—one at Adelaide and one at Melbourne—with two missionaries and 115 members.

At the Conference of 1860 a Trustees' Mutual Guarantee Fund was established against losses by fire, to include all Connectional property.

A training institution for the preparation of young men for the ministry was for some years under consideration. The Conference of 1861 resolved upon having one; and owing to the noble generosity of Thomas Firth, of Sheffield, such an institution was erected at Ranmoor, near that town. Its trustees were appointed in 1862, and the college was opened and a tutor selected in 1864. In 1880 there were nine students in residence, who paid £10 per annum. The president of the Conference was the principal and only tutor at that period. The college building cost £8710.

The Conference of 1865 resolved that a copy of Bagster's Bible, the Conference Journal, the deed-poll, and the general rules of the society should in future be the insignia of office of the president, to be handed down in succession. The same Conference resolved that all future conferences of their body should meet on the second Monday in June, instead of Whit-Monday as previously, the latter being a movable date, which was often attended with much inconvenience to both ministers and laymen. Mr. Alderman Blackburn, of Leeds, a wealthy layman, presented to each of the ex-presidents of Conference for fourteen years previously to the year 1863 a copy of Bagster's Bible and the new hymn-book, then first published. A new tune-book, adapted to the hymn-book, was prepared by the Rev. J. Ogden, and published in 1866.

The Conference of 1868 resolved on a new departure from existing usage, and consented to ministerial appointments being continued for five successive years in circuits where two thirds of the quarterly meeting request it. The limit had previously been three years.

A further attempt at union was made at the Conference of 1870, when the terms for a federal union with the Bible Christians were considered, and resolutions recorded thereon. The same Conference resolved that home missionaries of fourteen years' standing be allowed to attend the Conference, but not to vote.

The Conference of 1871 approved of the raising of a fund to extinguish the Chapel Fund debt. The sum of £4672 was raised, which accomplished the object desired.

(WESL.) M. NEW CONNECTION 933 WESLEYAN REFORM UNION

The Conference held at Manchester in 1872 was presided over by the Rev. Joseph H. Robinson, the secretary being the Rev. J. C. Watts. Both these ministers had spent many years in the Canada mission. Methodist union in Canada was fully considered in 1873, and the union was consummated in 1874.

It was resolved in 1875 to establish a training institution in China for native teachers. The principal is the Rev. John Innocent.

The Conference of 1876 was made memorable by acts of fraternization of considerable interest. The Methodist Church of Canada sent as a deputation to the Conference the venerable and Rev. Egerton Ryerson, D.D., and Mr. David Savage, who presented an address of brotherly fraternization. They were most cordially welcomed. Dr. Ryerson remained some time in England as the guest of various friends of the Connection. His portrait was ordered to be engraved and published in the magazine as a pleasant memorial of his visit. At the same Conference, the Rev. Alexander Clarke, D.D., presented a fraternal message from the General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church in the United States of America. Fraternal messages were returned to both documents. The same Conference sent its first fraternal message to the Primitive Methodists of England, which greetings were continued and reciprocated for three years, when, in 1879, the New Connection Conference, seeing how kindly their written messages had been received, appointed two of the members of the Conference to visit the ensuing Primitive Methodist Conference, two others to visit the Methodist Free Church Conference, and two others to visit the Wesleyan Conference. Each of the conferences appointed representatives to return these visits of fraternal good-will, and the good work has since been continued with very happy results; and the feeling of surprise now is that such pleasant reunions by representation should have been so long delayed. They serve to facilitate the arrangements for holding the Ecumenical Congress in 1881. At the Conference of 1876, Mr. Mark Firth presented £1000 to the endowment fund of the college, and the home and foreign missionary societies were united under one committee of management.

In 1877 a loan fund was commenced for the purpose of aiding chapel trusts and of encouraging the erection of new chapels.

The Conference of 1880 was remarkable for its record of deaths among the ministers, no less than six of whom, all men of distinction, had died during the year. Their names were Parkinson Thomas Gilton, William Baggaly, Henry Only Crofts, D.D., John Taylor, Charles Mann, and Benjamin B. Turnock, A.B. The four first named had been presidents of the Conference. As many as six ministers had never before died in one year.

* Expulsion of Joseph Barker, which caused a loss of 29 societies and 4348 members.

(G. J. S.)

Wesleyan Methodists. See WESLEYANS.

Wesleyan Reform Union. This organization had its origin in the expulsion of the Revs. James Everett, Samuel Dunn, and William Griffith from the Wesleyan Conference, in August, 1849. These expulsions took the people of England, and the Methodist people in particular, so entirely by surprise that the whole press of the country, excepting only two or three papers, took the part of the expelled ministers. Meetings of Methodists were held in many of the great centres in England, and the popular feeling, fanned by the voice of the press, was in a few months manifested by tens of thousands of members and office-bearers signing memorials to the Conference against the expulsions. In response thereto, the Conference ordered the preachers to withhold society tickets from all who signed such memorials, whether officers or members, and that policy was continued for about two years, until the funds of the Connection became so embarrassed that the expulsion policy had to be abandoned.

Seeing the desolation which prevailed in so many societies, all the efforts made by members for redress being repulsed by the Conference, another effort was made in December, 1851, by a large number of influential lay officers in the Connection who had not been expelled, who drew up a memorial to the Conference under twelve heads, asking for the cessation of the severe disciplinary action of the preachers, and also for some form of lay representation in the chief courts of Methodism. This was known as the Mediation Movement, and their memorial was in a short time signed by over two thousand Methodist, chiefly official persons.

The Conference of 1852 declined to receive or negotiate with any deputation with regard to the said memorial, and in reply thereto "indulged in rancorous invective against many of the memorialists." Every effort at reconciliation with the Conference having been made by the people, and resistance being the only reply, it became necessary to take care of the thousands of members who, by the withholding of their society tickets, had been cut off from membership.

Not wishing to establish a separate body, early in the year 1850 a large meeting was held in Finsbury, London, of delegates from all parts of England, about four hundred in number, all of whom less than a year before held office in Methodist societies. After several days' deliberation a form of constitution was agreed upon, and the best arrangements made for keeping the members united, till all negotiations were found to be of no avail, when it was resolved, first, that they should exist as the Reform Union, and afterwards as the United Methodist Reformers.

The details of the various steps taken for several years to reform the constitution of the Wesleyan Conference so as to admit laymen into the higher Church courts, and so open the way for the return of thousands into fellowship, having all failed, to avoid, if possible, making another separate body, the Conference of the New Connection was applied to, but that body did not feel disposed to make the concessions asked, so as to open the door for union. Had they done so, their membership might have been doubled immediately. Some local societies did unite with them. Ultimately, in 1856, a meeting was held in Exeter Hall of appointed representatives from the Wesleyan Methodist Association (of 1835) and the Wesleyan Reformers (of 1849), when terms of union were agreed upon which resulted in the amalgamation of the two bodies under the name of "United Methodist Free Churches."

At the eighth meeting of the delegates of the Reformers, held at Bristol in August, 1856, the statistics of their society were as follows:

Chapels.....	1,333
Lay preachers.....	2,525
Ministers.....	139
Class-leaders.....	2,878
Members.....	46,609
Members on trial.....	2,179
Sunday-schools.....	706
Teachers.....	12,118
Scholars.....	71,175

Although most of the leading societies belonging to the Reformers resolved on amalgamation, yet during the first year only 19,113 took action; and as there was a strong feeling of independence existing in many places, so long as they were able to maintain the minister of their choice, these societies kept a separate existence, in consequence of which action some members of the Reform Union determined not to amalgamate. In 1857 more than 26,800 members adhered to their original principles. That number was, however, soon considerably reduced. In 1858 nearly 2000 united with the Free Churches; and in 1859 over 5500 acted in the same way, and so the process went on, year by year several separate societies uniting in a body with the Free Churches, still leaving a few who maintained a separate existence as the Reform Union.

This body has had its headquarters at Exeter Hall from its origin. It established a book-room there, and commenced the publication of a monthly magazine in 1851, as The Wesleyan Reformer, the first editor being Mr. Robert Bulman, its second Mr. N. T. Langridge, its third Mr. Nichols. In 1853 its title was changed to the Wesleyan Methodist Penny Magazine. The committee also established a monthly magazine for the scholars in the Sunday-schools. Owing to its gradually diminished numbers, chiefly by amalgamation, it has for more than ten years past been the smallest section of the Methodist family, and its continued existence as a separate body has been a source of regret for some years, seeing that decadence has marked its course almost continuously from the time its members declined to amalgamate. The statistics of the past four years will be sufficient to indicate its position and influence.

Year.	Preachers.	Members.
1877.....	19.....	7703
1878.....	20.....	7673
1879.....	19.....	7623
1880.....	18.....	7728

Their doctrines are identical in all respects with those of the Wesleyan Methodists. The points of polity or discipline in which they differ are, that their ministers may remain as many years in a circuit as the people may desire; and they permit lay preachers to baptize their children, and to administer the Lord's supper, thus placing ministers and laymen on an equality in ministerial functions.

In addition to the serial publications previously named, the committee of the Reform Union resolved to take advantage of the book-room to secure funds for carrying on their work; and as large profits had been made by the sale of the hymn-books used by their societies, the book committee was the first to try the experiment of enlarging the hymn-book which had so long been in use by English Methodists. The Rev. James Everett, who had himself once been employed in the book-room of the parent society, learning that there were only about eight hymns in the Wesleyan collection which were copyrighted, supplied their places by others of Charles Wesley's, and added to them as many more new and popular hymns as made a book of a thousand hymns. To these were added for the first time the authors' names, not in all instances correctly, but as nearly so as was then possible. The book was a success, and as the usual discount was allowed on it to booksellers, which at that time the Wesleyans did not allow, many thousands soon found their way even into the congregations of the parent society. That improved edition in due time led the way to a still better collection being issued by the book-room of the Methodist Free Churches, and since, a still more modern one by the Wesleyan Conference itself. The Reform book-room has for some years published the Local Preachers' Magazine, at twopence monthly, a serial which has for many years, unofficially, been very helpful to many industrious lay preachers. It has also published other Methodist works, chiefly remainders of editions of good books which authors wished to dispose of, but which the rigid rules of the Wesleyan book-room prevented from admission into their sales. (G. J. S.)

Wesleyanism, or METHODIST ARMINIANISM, is a reproduction of the original doctrine of James Arminius (q. v.), the Dutch Remonstrant, an epithet gained by his followers for their opposition to the Calvinistic views eventually embodied in the action of the Synod of Dort. The soundest and most prudent of the early Arminian theologians were Episcopius and Limborch, who developed the views of their great leader substantially as held by the Wesleyan Methodists both in America and Great Britain; but a few of the Remonstrants, especially Grotius, and, to some extent, Curcellæus, exhibited signs of a freethinking tendency, especially on the doctrine of the atonement. The intermediate English Arminians carried these erratic elements to the verge of Socinianism, and thus gave a color to the charge of Pelagianism with which Calvinistic writers—at least until very recent times—have been too frequently in the habit of branding Arminianism in general. See ARMINIANISM.

John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, came of Arminian stock. His father, Samuel, like many of the evangelical Anglican divines of that period, was opposed to the tenets of Calvinism (see Tyerman, Life of Samuel Wesley, p. 144), and the sons of the latter naturally grew up in the same sentiments. Whitefield, on the contrary, who was likewise a member of "the Holy Club," as the first Methodists were called at Oxford, was of Calvinistic persuasion, and on this ground alone a separation ultimately took place from the Wesleys, Whitefield eventually becoming the founder of the Welsh, or Calvinistic, Methodists of Lady Huntingdon's Connection. The views of Wesley are thus historically of a remonstrant or polemical cast on this subject, the main point of controversy always being the dogma of predestination, which is central in the Calvinistic scheme. We propose here, however, to develop the principal features of Wesleyanism positively in a logical order out of the more radical idea of the divine nature. See WESLEY, JOHN.

1. Wesleyans hold that God's foreknowledge is intuitive and absolute, not being a deduction or inference from his purposes or power. They ground this doctrine upon Scripture: "Whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate" (Rom. viii, 29). Dr. Charles Hodge, in his note on this passage (Commentary, p. 447), after frankly admitting that the "knowledge" here spoken of is not merely a cognition of the existence of the individuals (for then it would apply equally to the elect and the reprobate), still ingeniously perverts the whole force of the argument by averring that "the foreknowledge . . . involves the idea of selection," which is tantamount to saying that there already was a secret bias or preference in the divine mind. Methodist Arminians, on the other hand, believe that this divine foreknowledge has reference to the character of the persons contemplated as about to accept the offer of salvation. They thus truly place the divine prescience as the basis of the divine plan or purposes, and maintain that such a view only is real foreknowledge. In this way they escape the causal force of the divine pre-contemplation, precisely as in the case of knowledge of any present or past facts which has no influence or power in producing them. See OMNISCIENCE. God foresees not only the future event, but also all its circumstances or conditions, and therefore knows that it is contingent, i. e. that although it certainly will take place, it yet might be otherwise. See PRESCIENCE.

2. Intimately connected with the foregoing position is that of the divine foreordination. Wesleyans hold that while God absolutely and of his own inscrutable purposes determines beforehand (whether from all eternity or not is of small moment) the events in the natural or physical world, he has not done so with regard to occurrences relating to the moral sphere; especially that he has left the everlasting state of human beings contingent upon the results of their own action. They reject the doctrine of unconditional election and repro-bation as incompatible with the justice and impartiality of the divine character, and with the freedom and responsibility of the human soul. They especially object to the doctrine that God has absolutely predetermined the final destiny of individuals in the other world irrespective of their conduct; but they have little controversy with that class of moderate Calvinists who restrict the divine foreordination to the general purposes of God's moral government, without predicating it of any and every particular act of intelligent creatures. A strict construction of the statement of the Westminster Confession, that "God decrees whatever comes to pass," would involve the divine will as the efficient element in all causality, and so be tantamount to the heterodoxy that "whatever is, is right." Or, if the language be interpreted as signifying that God has so arranged the universe (both of matter and of mind) that events must inevitably transpire just as they do, this is equivalent to a declaration of necessity or fate. But if it be merely meant that God has instituted laws, forces, or causes (whether primary or secondary, physical or spiritual) which he permits (or, if any prefer so to say, enables) to act freely yet certainly (within given limits) in bringing about whatever occurs, then we have but the expression of what is matter of fact undeniable by any. This is no proper foreordination at all, for it ranks the human agent as a leading factor among these freely moving powers, and hangs the larger part of events upon the contingencies of his conduct. See PREDESTINATION.

3. Wesleyan Methodists further maintain that although man is universally born with corrupt moral affections and a depraved will, yet by virtue of the general atonement of Christ and the free bestowment of the Holy Spirit every person is graciously enabled so to resist the tendencies to evil as to lay hold upon the proffered means of salvation. They believe, indeed, that in response to the intercessions of the Divine Mediator, and in answer to the prayers of Christians, special conviction is often sent into the souls of sinners, but that this may still be resisted by the subject, and thus prove abortive. They also believe that the general convictions resulting from the ordinary influences of the Spirit are sufficient, if encouraged and fostered, to lead the sinner to Christ. They admit that none will or can come to God without such divine drawings; but they believe that these are never withheld from the sincere and compliant soul. The ultimate force, therefore, which determines any person in turning away from sin and towards God is the human will itself, acting freely in view of motives made clear and cogent by God's Spirit, but never coerced thereby. The self-determinative power of the human will is consequently a fundamental axiom in Wesleyan theology. See WILL.

4. Wesleyans hold that saving faith is a conscious surrender of the soul to God and a positive trust in the merits of Christ. This faith is indeed potentially the gift of God, but its exercise is the voluntary personal act of the believer. Conversion, in Wesleyan theology, is the entire process of change from a state of condemnation and sin to one of pardon and holiness. Regeneration is a change in the moral affections resulting by divine power immediately upon this act of faith, which presupposes the penitence and consecration required. See REGENERATION.

Wesleyanism accordingly teaches that justification and adoption are simultaneous, the former being the act of pardon, and the latter the relation of filial acceptance. A degree of sanctification is also held to be experienced at the same time, being a state of comparative holiness, consisting in a fixed purpose and disposition to love and serve God, the fruit of which immediately begins to appear in the life. The first of these elements takes place in the divine mind, and a knowledge of it as a fact is derived by the converted person from a consideration of the conscious exercise of faith to that end; the second is a mutual change, testified to the soul by a special "witness of the Spirit" (q. v.), which is distinct from all other evidence, although concomitant and corroborative; and the third element takes place exclusively in the human subject, and is evidenced by the alteration felt in the heart and shown in the life; but they all three are equally and wholly the effect of the operation of the Holy Spirit. The man does not save himself, but simply consents to be saved, depends upon Christ to be saved, and co-operates with God for his salvation. It follows from the above showing that the converted person knows for the time being his gracious condition by this threefold testimony, one or the other part of which, however, may for the moment preponderate.

5. Wesleyanism, moreover, maintains that this salvation is not only free and present, but also full, i. e. that it is the privilege of every believer to be entirely sanctified in this life, and to live without actually feeling or committing any known sin. They admit, of course, the continual peccability of human nature, and do not claim Adamic or angelic perfection for any human being since the Fall; but they nevertheless insist upon the privilege and duty of complete holiness in heart and life as not only necessary for heaven, but possible indefinitely before death. They differ to some degree among themselves as to the instantaneous or progressive character of this experience, and also as to its date with reference to conversion, but they all agree in looking for it during life and health, on precisely the same terms of consecration, faith, and co-operation as required by regeneration. See SANCTIFICATION.

6. Finally, holding the above views of the power and coercion of the human will at every stage of the redemptive process, Wesleyans universally believe that it is possible for any, even the highest Christian, to fall from grace and ultimately perish, and they think they find actual instances of such lapse in the Scriptures and in common life. As none are absolutely elected to eternal life, so none are fully secure of it until probation is entirely ended. See PERSEVERANCE.

Literature.—The most exhaustive as well as oldest polemic on these distinctive features of Wesleyan Arminianism is Fletcher's Checks to Antinomianism (Lond. 1771 sq., and often since); but the subject is discursively treated likewise in Wesley's Sermons (in Works). A topical discussion is given in Watson's Institutes (Lond. 1822, and since), in Pope's Christian Theology (ibid. 1875-77, 3 vols. 8vo), and in Raymond's Systematic Theology (Cincin. 1877 sq., 3 vols. 8vo). For other works, see ARMINIANISM; METHODISM.

Wesleyans is a general name for all adherents or followers of John Wesley, the founder of Arminian Methodism; but by usage it is commonly limited to the regular Methodists of the British Conference, in distinction from those of the other kindred bodies in America, Great Britain, Ireland, and elsewhere, which in this Cyclopædia are treated under separate heads.

I. History.—As much of this is the common property of all Methodist bodies throughout the world, we give it here somewhat in extenso.

Methodism in its origin was the child of Providence. Its founder, John Wesley, was also a child of Providence; and nearly the whole of his career on earth was marked by indications of the special and peculiar, sometimes marvellous, interposition of God in his behalf. In the origin, growth, and wide diffusion of Methodism, we can trace the evidence of the divine hand opening its way and directing its course. In all its past history, now covering a period of one hundred and forty years, when its movements were in accordance with the indications of Providence, it prospered; on the other hand, many of the changes in its operations, which were of human origin, and the outcome of expediency only, have been the cause of obstruction and often of painful disappointment and loss.

1. Inception of the Wesleyan Body.—The embodiment of Methodism is John Wesley; and during the fifty-one years of his life which elapsed between its actual formation and the death of its founder, Mr. Wesley was its source and life. Born at Epworth in 1703, he entered the Charterhouse School, London, in 1714; in 1719 he was continuing his studies, under his brother Samuel, at the Westminster School; and in 1720 he entered Christ Church College, Oxford. In 1725 he was ordained deacon by Dr. John Potter, bishop of Oxford, who, in the advice he gave the young deacon, said, "If he wishes to be extensively useful, he must not spend his time in contending for or against things of a disputable nature, but in testifying against notorious vice, and in promoting real, essential holiness." Here were the germs of that life-work which produced Methodism. In 1729 John Wesley began to take pupils at Oxford, and some of the more serious of these united with their teacher in visiting the prisoners in the Castle and the sick poor in the city; and they commenced a systematic course of living which soon led to their being called Methodists. That was the first origin of the Society so designated.

Ten years elapsed. Both John and Charles Wesley had been out to America as missionaries in the meantime. Returning to England in 1738, they were both introduced to Peter Bohler and other Moravian brethren, from whom they learned the way of salvation by faith; and themselves entering into the liberty of the children of God, in the month of June, 1738, were made so happy in their new experience that they began in great earnestness to preach that doctrine everywhere.

In a remarkable manner the Spirit of God gave most convincing evidence of the completeness of the change which had been wrought by faith in both the brothers. This was more distinctly and emphatically shown by the spiritual awakening which accompanied and followed the preaching of John Wesley. He had to preach in St. Mary's Church, Oxford, before the University. His text was, "By grace are ye saved through faith;" and he explained the new doctrine with a clearness, fullness, and force which had not been known before in that famous seat of learning. That sermon was printed and widely circulated. It was followed by another on "God's free grace," in which, with equal lucidity and power, he set forth the doctrine "that the grace or love of God is free in all, and free for all." This sermon was printed in a cheap form; and those sermons, repeated in various forms and places, "gave birth to the greatest revival of religion" the world has ever known.

He desired, in his own mind, to retire to Oxford to his beloved obscurity, but Divine Providence ordered otherwise; and John Wesley was detained in London and importuned to preach these new doctrines, in various churches, thrice every Sunday, and on week-days also. One source of attraction was that he had recently returned from America, which was considered a far country; and he related some of his experience in the course of his discourses. Multitudes flocked to hear him, and soon the churches were unable to hold the crowds which assembled. In a short time, partly because of the large assemblies and partly owing to the new doctrines, he was excluded from one church, then from another, till at length he was shut out of all the churches. Not daring to be silent, after a short struggle between honor and conscience, he made a virtue of necessity, and preached in the open air—first in Moorfields, London, then at Kennington, and in many other parts of England.

Thousands upon thousands of persons—in some instances ten thousand, in others twenty thousand, and even more as computed by Mr. Wesley himself, and recorded by him in his Journals—attended his out-door services. This step was not taken in any spirit of antagonism to the Church; quite the contrary. During one month in 1739, both John and Charles Wesley had interviews with the bishop of Gloucester, Gibson, bishop of London, and Potter, archbishop of Canterbury, to talk over their conduct; and with kindly results in each case. Mr. Whitefield, also, had similar interviews with bishops respecting his preaching in the open air. It is plain, therefore, that the resistance these three clergymen met with did not proceed from the heads of the Established Church, but from those of the clergy who were at ease in their comfortable livings, and who saw that their quiet enjoyment would be broken if the proceedings of these evangelists were not stopped. Hence it was that many newspapers and magazines were used by those clergymen to slander and misrepresent the work of the Wesleys and Whitefield.

During the summer and autumn of 1739, there were witnessed by thousands of persons most remarkable manifestations of divine power at many of the open-air services conducted by John Wesley. The preaching of George Whitefield and Charles Wesley, at the same period and to the same congregations, was quite as faithful and even more impassioned, at times, than was John Wesley's; but it was to the preaching of John Wesley only that those special manifestations were given. At London and at Bristol, on various occasions and at divers places, during the six months preceding the formation of the United Societies, scores of persons were smitten down under his preaching, in the open air and in small meetings in rooms; such signs had never been before witnessed since apostolic times. Mr. Wesley himself wrote: "More and more of the people were cut to the heart, and came to me all in tears, inquiring with the utmost eagerness what they must do to be saved." These penitents were counted by scores and hundreds during the autumn of 1739; and it was the witnessing of the deep agony of spirit and anguish of heart that awakened the sympathy of two gentlemen, who attended the preaching at Moorfields, to provide a place of shelter for those poor stricken ones.

Northward of the preaching ground at Moorfields—only a few hundred yards, but surrounded by fields—the Old Gunnery, or foundry for cannon, had stood in ruins for more than twenty years. Mr. Wesley was pressed to take the premises into his own hands; but he had to decline them, having no funds. Mr. Ball and Mr. Watkins, two kindly disposed friends, finding that the tenancy could be secured for £15, loaned that sum to Mr. Wesley; but, as the place was a vast heap of ruinous buildings, a large additional sum had to be spent to fit it up as a place for religious worship. The roofless building, with tottering walls, was first used by Mr. Wesley on Sunday evening, Nov. 11, 1739. The cost of fitting up the Foundry for worship was about £800, which sum was paid in three years by small subscriptions from many friends who had shared in the blessings which came with the preached word.

The exact date of the origin of Methodism is not known; but it was within the three weeks embraced within the last week in November and the first fourteen days of December in 1739. A large number of persons had been converted within six months, who had been joined to the Moravians. In Mr. Wesley's works are found several allusions made by him to that period. The two following passages convey the clearest account we have: "In the latter end of the year 1739, eight or ten persons came to me in London, who appeared to be deeply convinced of sin and earnestly groaning for redemption. They desired I would spend some time with them in prayer and advise them how to flee from the wrath to come. That we might have more time for this great work, I appointed a day when they might all come together, which, from thenceforward, they did every Thursday, in the evening. To these, and as many more as desired to join with them, I gave those advices which I judged most needful for them; and we always concluded our meetings with prayer suited to their several necessities. This was the rise of the United Society; first in London, then in other places." The first meetings were class-meetings, and John Wesley was the leader. In another extract we find the following additional details: "The first evening about twelve persons came; the next week thirty or forty. When they were increased to about a hundred, I took down their names and places of abode, intending, as often as it was convenient, to call upon them at their homes. Thus, without any previous plan, began the Methodist Society in England—a company of people associated together to help each other to work out their own salvation."

Such is the account of the origin of Methodism from the pen of its founder, who, in a small tract which he issued shortly before their organization, thus describes the character of a Methodist:

"A Methodist is one who has the love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost given unto him: one who loves the Lord his God with all his heart, and soul, and mind, and strength. He rejoices evermore, prays without ceasing, and in everything gives thanks. His heart is full of love to all mankind, and is purified from envy, malice, wrath, and every unkind affection. His own desire, and the one design of his life, is not to do his own will, but the will of Him that sent him. He keeps all God's commandments, from the least to the greatest. He follows not the customs of the world; for vice does not lose its nature through its becoming fashionable. He fares not sumptuously every day. He cannot lay up treasure upon the earth; nor can he adorn himself with gold or costly apparel. He cannot join in any diversion that has the least tendency to vice. He cannot speak evil of his neighbor any more than he can tell a lie. He cannot utter unkind or evil words. No corrupt communication ever comes out of his mouth. He does good unto all men; unto neighbors, strangers, friends, and enemies. These are the principles and practices of our sect. These are the marks of a true Methodist. By these alone do Methodists desire to be distinguished from other men."

2. Progress of the Wesleys during Mr. Wesley's Lifetime.—For the first century of its existence the history of Methodism was a series of providences. In a condensed record, which this is required to be, these providential openings can be very little more than indicated.

From the time the Wesley brothers returned from America they were both closely connected with the Moravians, whose meeting-house was, and is still, in Fetter Lane. It is probably true that most of the accessions made to their society during the years 1738 and 1739 were the fruits of the labors of the two Wesleys and Whitefield. Even after Mr. Wesley began his own society, in December, 1739, he himself continued to meet with the Moravians; and he took with him many of those who adhered to him as the results of his ministry.

As early as June, 1738, John Wesley visited the Moravian settlement at Herrnhut, Germany, where he remained three months, conversing freely with the Brethren on their doctrines and discipline. In December of the same year Mr. Wesley drew up for the society in Fetter Lane the rules of the Band Societies—companies of not less than five nor more than ten—who met together once a week for religious conversation and prayer. A series of nine questions were prepared and used on each occasion as helps and instructions; and the design of those meetings was embodied in a series of ten propositions and inquiries. These were the basis of the United Societies which began to meet under Mr. Wesley in December, 1739.

In April, 1739, John Wesley was excluded from the churches in Bristol, and a few months later he was also excluded from the London churches. Mr. Whitefield and Charles Wesley were also included in the prohibition. Mr. Whitefield commenced open-air preaching near Bristol, with such happy results that John Wesley soon saw a wide door of usefulness opened to him in that plan; and he readily adopted it, with such marks of divine approbation as had not been before witnessed. This led to the commencement of the system of the itinerancy, and necessitated the employment of lay helpers; hence lay preachers had to be engaged to watch over the new converts, gathered out of the world by the labors of those apostolic men.

The earliest of these lay helpers were Joseph Humphreys, Thomas Maxfield, and John Cennick. The first-named is thus introduced to us by Mr. Wesley himself:

"Joseph Humphreys, the first lay preacher that assisted me in England in 1738. He was perfected in love, and so continued for at least twelve months. Afterwards he turned Calvinist, joined Mr. Whitefield, and published an invective against me and my brother Charles. In a while he renounced Mr. Whitefield, turned Presbyterian minister, then received Episcopal ordination, and, finally, scoffed at inward religion"—a catalogue of delinquencies long enough to cause his name to be excluded from the true friends of Methodism.

Thomas Maxfield was converted under Mr. Wesley's preaching, at Bristol, in May, 1739. He had an excellent gift for preaching, and was very useful in keeping together and instructing the young converts in London during Mr. Wesley's absence. Some Churchmen raised a cry against Maxfield's preaching at the Foundry, and they sent their complaints to Mr. Wesley in the country, who hastened to London to silence him; but, on meeting his aged mother, who had heard Maxfield, she desired her son to hear him and judge for himself if he was not qualified to preach as certainly as Mr. Wesley was. That wise admonition of Mrs. Wesley led to the regular appointment of Thomas Maxfield early in 1740 to preach as a lay helper at the Foundry. He continued in office at the Foundry some twenty-three years, and after Mr. Wesley's marriage joined Mrs. Wesley in her prejudices; and in 1763 he separated from Mr. Wesley, taking with him one hundred and seventy members. He gathered an independent congregation in London, to whom he ministered for many years; but was reconciled to Mr. Wesley before his death, and Mr. Wesley preached in his chapel in 1783.

John Cennick joined Mr. Wesley at Bristol, and was very useful in that city and at Kingswood; but, not agreeing with Mr. Wesley's views on general redemption, he joined Mr. Whitefield, and became a useful minister in many parts of the United Kingdom.

In 1740 Mr. Wesley preached against predestination, and Mr. Whitefield published a reply to it in 1741, in which he advocated unconditional election, irresistible grace, and final perseverance. Charles Wesley's Hymns and John Wesley's Sermons being directly opposed to Mr. Whitefield's doctrinal views, a separation took place, which continued for many years; but Providence brought good out of what appeared to many, at the time, a serious evil.

July 23, 1740, Mr. Wesley separated from the Moravians.

In December, 1741, several disturbances having taken place at the services held by Mr. Wesley, one of the leading London magistrates voluntarily waited on the king, George II. In a few days, Sir John Ganson called on Mr. Wesley on behalf of the city magistrates, and reported "that the Middlesex magistrates had received orders from above to do you justice whenever you apply to us." That spontaneous kindness checked the disturbances, and the London societies had peace ever afterwards.

In 1742, the societies having greatly increased, and numbering several thousand members, they were formed into classes of twelve or more persons, with a properly qualified person to lead them. In February, at Bristol, the same year, the debts on buildings were mentioned, and offers were made to contribute a small sum weekly as the best way of paying the debts. Leaders were desired to collect what each member would give weekly, and a steward was then appointed to receive these amounts from the leaders weekly. Class-leaders and stewards were thus early chosen and appointed. The Select Society, or Band Society, consisting of justified persons only, was established in 1742. Members meeting in band had on their quarterly ticket, besides the usual distinguishing marks, a large B. Band tickets have been provided in England regularly each quarter ever since, but they are usually given now as ordinary tickets. Indeed, some of the preachers do not know what the letter B on the ticket represents.

Watch-night services began as early as April, 1742. The converted colliers at Kingswood first began them as a substitute for their midnight meetings held at the ale-house. They began at eight or nine o'clock, and continued until midnight. Mr. Wesley at once approved, and fixed them, first monthly, at the full of the moon, then quarterly, and recommended them to all his societies. They are now held only on the last night of the year.

Quarterly society tickets were first given in 1742. For over twenty years these were issued in three or four localities, each having a different design. Inconvenience having arisen from these varieties, the ticket of one district not being known or recognised in another, the Conference in 1765 ordered a uniform ticket to be issued from London, the first of which is dated February, 1766. For fifty years these tickets were only about an inch square—a very simple record—containing the date, a text of Scripture, and a large capital Roman letter enclosed in a simple border, with the member's name written by the preacher who gave it on the margin. In 1816, at the suggestion of the Rev. Jabez Bunting, the ticket was a little enlarged to give space within the border for the member's name. In 1822, when Mr. Bunting was Connectional editor, he again altered the ticket, making it twice as large as before, and adding the name and origin of the society at the head. The design was thought by the Conference too fanciful, and three tickets only of that kind having been issued, it next was printed with a ray border around it in 1823, and in that form it has appeared ever since. The tickets were used to admit the members to love-feasts, society meetings, and the Lord's supper. The addition of a few lines by the preacher at the back of the ticket made it a passport for a member to any society of Methodists either in England or the colonies. Recently a proper form for the removal of members has been provided.

In 1742 Mr. Wesley and John Nelson itinerated through parts of Yorkshire and Cornwall, establishing Methodism in many places. During that year the organization of Methodism was nearly completed.

On May 1, 1743, the rules of the society were first published in a small tract of eight pages, with the title The Nature, Design, and General Rules of the United Societies in London, Bristol, Newcastle-on-Tyne, etc. They recite briefly the origin of the societies, and then describe the objects and characteristics of Methodism. Twenty editions of that tract were issued during Mr. Wesley's lifetime.

In 1743 sick-visitors were appointed, the leaders of classes furnishing the names of persons to be visited, and the stewards supplying pecuniary aid when needed.

In June, 1744, the first Conference was held. Mr. Wesley invited six clergymen and five lay preachers to meet him in London, at the Foundry, and five days were occupied with its deliberations. The first included preliminary plans and a discussion on justification; the second, a discussion on sanctification; the third, on the Church; the fourth, on discipline; and the fifth was devoted to the appointment of officers and defining their duties. A full record of their deliberations was preserved, and it shows how completely the whole scheme of Methodist discipline was outlined in their earliest deliberations. It came almost perfect from the first deliberative assembly.

The year 1745 was memorable for the inquiry made in the Conference, Is Episcopal, Presbyterian, or Independent Church government most reasonable? The unrest of Mr. Wesley's mind was deepened by correspondence with the Rev. Wesley Hall, who had urged him to renounce the Church of England. At that time, Mr. Wesley believed in apostolical succession and the offering of an outward sacrifice by the priest. These dogmas were soon afterwards given up by him. On his journey to Bristol, in January, 1746, Mr. Wesley read lord King's Inquiry into the Constitution, Discipline,

Unity, and Worship of the Primitive Church. As the result of the discussion held in the Conference of 1745, Mr. Wesley considered his lay helpers as deacons and presbyters, and himself as a scriptural bishop. Lord King's book confirmed those opinions. He took time to consider the whole question; and at the Conference of 1747, in a series of nine questions and answers, he states plainly his acceptance and adoption of a Presbyterian form of Church government. He renounced all his High-Church notions, and his legislation in Conference after that date was based upon the convictions wrought in his mind by Lord King's work. Even apostolical succession had to go. Of that, some years afterwards, he wrote, "I never could see it proved, and I am persuaded I never shall." His preference for the Church of England remained, but his practice was in accordance with the Dissenters in Church polity. Although Mr. Wesley did not for forty years after that period resort to the imposition of hands in ordination, yet the preachers he employed were solemnly set apart to the pastoral office; and the fact of his laying-on of hands shortly before his death was more a matter of form than the conferring of any special grace or qualification. He founded societies or churches all over the land, and he solemnly set apart godly men as their pastors. If there was some inconsistency in Mr. Wesley's adhesion to the Church of England, and his establishing a separate Church in the land, it was more the result of necessity than design.

In 1746 England was divided into seven circuits, for the better carrying-on of the itinerancy and the systematic government of the societies. Circuit stewards were that year first appointed and quarterly meetings first held. At that meeting all the finances of the circuit were reported, receipts and expenses, and those reports were carried up to the yearly Conference.

In 1747 a tract society was commenced in Methodism. Mr. Wesley had himself written and published a dozen tracts, the wide distribution of which was made a blessing to many people.

The wisdom and forethought of Mr. Wesley were clearly shown in June, 1748, when he opened a large school on the top of Kingswood Hill, Bristol, for the education of the children of his preachers. That school still exists; but nearly a quarter of a century since it was changed in its character to a Reformatory School, and a much larger and more convenient establishment was erected near Bath as the School for Methodist Preachers' Children, which is known as New Kingswood. In 1813 a second school for the same purpose was purchased and opened at Woodhouse Grove, near Leeds, Yorkshire. For some years, the latter has been the juvenile school and New Kingswood the finishing school, and it has taken high rank among the first-class classical and mathematical schools in England. There is a scheme under consideration for the union of these schools, or for some enlargement which will admit of the larger number of preachers' sons, owing to the greatly increased number of Methodist preachers. These schools have each a history full of interest, at least to Methodists; but no friendly hand has yet undertaken to be the chronicler of their instructive records. From those schools have gone forth youths who have risen to the highest positions in law, theology, and medicine; while in commercial life Methodist preachers' sons take rank with the best in the land. In the present years (1880-81), the son of an Irish Methodist preacher is the lord mayor of London, he having been also sheriff of London and Middlesex. Among the senators in the House of Commons are sons of Methodist preachers, who are distinguished as accomplished speakers and able legislators. No less than ten sons of Methodist preachers have been presidents of the Methodist Conference. While much of this distinction is doubtless due to natural genius and persevering effort, yet these owe their inception, growth, and success largely to the excellent training obtained in the schools for preachers' children. A public collection is made through all the societies once in the year for these schools. It was appointed by Mr. Wesley when the first school was opened, and it has been continued ever since. The collection was instituted when the salary of a preacher was not more than £12 a year.

In January, 1750, a union took place between Mr. Whitefield and Mr. Wesley. Doctrinal differences separated them ten years previously; but they began this year by preaching in each other's chapels, and so, records Mr. Wesley, "one more stumbling-block is removed."

In 1751 the first disruption in Methodism took place. John Bennett, who had been a preacher for eight years, separated from Mr. Wesley, charging him with being a pope and preaching popery. During the same year, James Wheatley, another preacher, was expelled by the united voice of both John and Charles Wesley. Both these men for a time created prejudice against the Wesleys, but the societies soon recovered their lost ground.

The Conference of 1752 agreed that the preachers should receive a stipend of £12 per annum to provide themselves with necessities. Previously no money salary was given, the stewards supplying the preachers with what they wanted. In the year 1800 the finances had improved sufficiently to allow the preachers £4 each quarter. Ten years later that amount was doubled in some circuits, and by the end of the first hundred years (1839) most of the preachers received £1 per week or more, besides a residence rent-free. In 1880 single young preachers receive as a minimum salary £80 a year, while some of the leading ministers receive a total annual salary which ranges from £250 to £350 from their circuits. Many excellent preachers left Mr. Wesley during his lifetime because no provision could be made for their wives and children, or for men worn out in the service.

In August, 1755, Mr. Wesley held the first covenant service in London. The form of service used is that written by that eminently holy Puritan Richard Alleine. The sacrament of the Lord's supper formed the closing part of the service. It has for many years been the custom to hold the covenant service in the afternoon, or during some part, of the first Sunday in each year, in all societies belonging to English Methodism. It has usually been a solemn but very interesting and profitable service.

The Conference of 1756 ordered a collection to be made yearly in all the societies, which for a century was known as the yearly collection, to assist in paying chapel debts, to help poor circuits, to pay the preachers' small salary, to encourage the opening of new preaching stations, and to pay legal costs when Methodists had to defend their rights against men who interfered with them. The debts on chapels in 1756 were £4000, and in 1812 they reached £100,000. Regulations made during the last quarter of a century provide against any such accumulations of debt. The yearly collection is made in the society classes among members only, and in 1880 it realized more than £8000. The General Fund, as first originated, has changed its name into Contingent Fund, or Home Mission and Contingent Fund. The several objects at first to be assisted by the fund have now each a separate collection for their support.

On several occasions evil-disposed persons had spoken against the moral character of some of the preachers. Mr. Wesley, hearing of these complaints, caused each preacher to be examined at the Conference of 1759, and such examination has been continued at each successive Conference. The punishments for offenders are a rebuke from the president before the whole Conference, being put back on trial, suspension for a year, or expulsion. One result of the first examination of character was a great revival of religion, which spread over most parts of England and into Ireland.

In 1762 Thomas Maxfield and George Bell separated from Mr. Wesley, and took with them a large number of members in the London society. This led Mr. Wesley, in 1763, to devise a plan for the union of all the societies in England, and to establish a Connectional principle which should be a bond of union and mutual help. The duties of assistants and helpers were defined, and the twelve rules of a helper written and published. The same year the preachers received instructions to sell the books issued from the book-room, and the first preacher in each circuit has acted as Connectional bookseller ever since.

The Conference of 1763 observing that some of the preachers were almost worn out and unable to itinerate, it was recommended that a fund be established to relieve the urgent needs of such as were obliged to rest. Each travelling preacher was desired to contribute ten shillings yearly to that fund. For forty years the provision thus made was utterly inadequate for the purpose designed. In 1807 the Conference reported that the fund was not sufficient to provide the superannuated preachers and their widows with even the necessities of life. Dr. Adam Clarke drew up a plan that year for increasing the fund. Subsequent conferences improved upon that plan, and for a time it was known as the Supernumerary Preachers and Preachers' Widows' Fund, then it was named the Auxiliary Fund, and in 1838 it was further improved and called the New Auxiliary Fund. The preachers contribute liberally to it, and a collection is made once a year in all the classes, so that the fund now yields a sum which enables each preacher and widow to receive from it a yearly sum that fully meets all the necessities of life and places each above want. The Rev. John Rattenbury devoted the last years of his valuable life to perfecting the resources and administration of that fund. In 1798 the Conference resolved that a preacher unable longer to itinerate should become a supernumerary, and at the end of four years he should be superannuated. Rules were afterwards made for permitting some supernumeraries to enter into business, in which case their names were removed from the list of preachers belonging to the Conference. In this way the Rev. Thomas Rankin, who presided over the first Methodist Conference held in America, having entered into business, had to suffer the removal of his name from the Conference roll, and his death was not recorded in the Minutes when he died.

At the Conference of 1765 it was resolved to issue from London one uniform society ticket of membership for all the societies. The first ticket so issued is dated February, 1766. The tickets have been printed and sent out by the book-room ever since. At the same Conference it was recommended that in speaking to and of the members of society the words "brother" and "sister" should be uniformly used as far as practicable. Those terms are still used by the older preachers and members.

The Conference of 1767 made a regulation that the same preacher shall not be sent above one year, never above two years, to the same circuit. The time has since been extended to three years. Once, by special request of the Bible Society, Dr. Adam Clarke was appointed a fourth year to the same circuit. Preachers who have ceased to itinerate, that they may occupy official positions in the Connection, are appointed by the Conference to the duties for a period of six years, which may be renewed at the discretion of the Conference. There are about eighty preachers located in office.

The question was agitated in 1768, Are the Methodists Churchmen or Dissenters? To this Mr. Wesley replied, "We are neither the one nor the other, but irregulars." A century later the same question was often asked, and answered in the same way. The position Methodism is now taking in the religious world is one which is securing for it the character of a Church, independent of all others, complete in its organization, and fast assuming a dominant place among the churches of Christendom.

In 1769 the Conference expressed its joy at hearing of the establishment of Methodism in America, and sent two of its preachers, Richard Boardman and Joseph Pilmoor, to adjust the new society, and to convey to them a substantial proof of its sympathy.

The Conference of 1770 was a very memorable one in Methodism. To raise a defence against Antinomianism, Mr. Wesley published a series of eight propositions respecting doctrine. These aroused a fierce controversy, Lady Huntingdon, Rev. Walter Shirley, and others using their most vigorous efforts against Mr. Wesley. Convinced that Mr. Wesley was right, all his preachers defended the propositions, and the Rev. John Fletcher wrote and published his Checks to Antinomianism, a masterly work, in defence of the Arminian doctrines of the Methodists.

The Rev. George Whitefield died in America in the September of 1770, and Mr. Wesley preached his funeral sermon in both Mr. Whitefield's tabernacles in London.

The year 1777 was memorable in Methodism as that in which the foundation of City Road Chapel was laid in London.

On Jan. 1, 1778, Mr. Wesley issued the first number of the Arminian Magazine, a work in defence of general redemption. It has appeared monthly without any interruption for one hundred and three years, and is nearly the oldest serial magazine in England. Its price for thirty-two years was sixpence each issue; in January, 1811, the price was raised to one shilling monthly, and so continued till it had completed a century of years, when the price was again reduced to sixpence. Soon after Mr. Wesley's death the title was changed to Methodist Magazine, and in 1822 the Rev. Jabez Bunting, as editor, changed it again to Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, which it still retains. When there were but few magazines in England, its highest circulation was about twenty-six thousand monthly; in 1880 the circulation was only eleven thousand, but it has many rivals. It has been a source of much revenue to Methodism, and an able and powerful defender of its doctrines, agencies, and experience. Its pages are richly stored with valuable history, and instructive and precious biography.

The Rev. Dr. Thomas Coke, an ordained clergyman who had joined Mr. Wesley in 1777, was sent by him to preside at the Irish Conference in 1782, and for nearly thirty years continued to preside over their deliberations, his visits to that country being, on the whole, a great blessing to the people. In 1784 Dr. Coke travelled over England to examine the trust-deeds of the chapels, and to get them settled on the Conference plan.

The last day of February, 1784, was a memorable one in the history of Methodism. To perpetuate the system of Methodism as it had been formulated by the experience of forty-three years, Mr. Wesley had drawn up a deed of declaration, which was enrolled in the Court of Chancery, by which one hundred ministers are to form the Annual Conference of Methodism, and the survivors are to fill up all vacancies once a year. The deed limits the sittings of the Conference to not less than five, nor more than twenty-one, days, and by that deed Methodism may be perpetuated till the end of time. Several preachers whose names were not included in the first selected hundred took offence and left the Connection, among whom were John Hampson, senior and junior, and Joseph Pilmoor, who went to America and did useful work in the Church.

The Conference of 1784 fixed the time for a preacher to remain on trial at four years; it had been less. Soon after the Conference Mr. Wesley ordained Dr. Coke, and sent him out to America to be joint superintendent over the Methodist brethren in that country with Francis Asbury. He also wrote and sent an important letter to the American societies, dated Bristol, Sept. 10, 1784, in which he embodied what to him seemed sufficient instructions for the establishment and perpetuation of a Methodist Church, and he sent them also an abridged liturgy for their use.

Sunday-schools were systematically commenced by the Methodists about the year 1784. Mr. Wesley himself had conducted a Sunday-school in Georgia, America, as early as 1736. In 1769 Hannah Ball, a young Methodist lady, conducted a Sunday-school ten years before Mr. Raikes began the work in Gloucester. Mr. Wesley early approved of the system, and one of the earliest letters written by Robert Raikes was published in the Arminian Magazine for January, 1785. That led the way to their general adoption by the Methodists. In 1812 the number of scholars in Methodist Sunday-schools was about 60,000; in 1880 the number was 787,143, with 119,911 teachers, in England, and a union was established for the Connection.

The action taken by Mr. Wesley in 1784 in ordaining Dr. Coke as superintendent or bishop to officiate in America, and ordaining Richard Whatcoat and Thomas Vasey to act as elders or deacons, was repeated in the following year, 1785, when he ordained John Pawson, Thomas Hanby, and Joseph Taylor to administer the sacraments in Scotland. In 1786 he ordained Joshua Keighley, Charles Atmore, William Warrenre, and William Hammett; the two latter were for mission stations abroad. In 1787 Duncan McAllum, Alexander Suter, and Jonathan Crowther were ordained by him, and in 1788 John Barber and Joseph Cowley were ordained elders, and Alexander Mather a superintendent. In 1789 Henry Moore and Thomas Rankin were ordained to have special charge of the London, Bath, and Bristol societies, and to administer the sacraments. Mr. Moore's parchment of orders was long in the possession of the writer. Mr. Rankin, five years previously, had convened and presided over the first Conference of Methodist preachers in America. These acts of ordination were strongly opposed by Charles Wesley, but such a proceeding on the part of John Wesley was justified by the surrounding circumstances of the time. It was one of those pacificatory measures which prevented what threatened to be a separation and loss of members. The conferences after Mr. Wesley's death did not recognize the "orders" thus given as conferring any superiority of position to the preachers thus ordained, excepting that some of them were permitted to administer the Lord's supper before other preachers could do so. Mr. Moore maintained his supposed rights to the end of his days, but the Conference did not regard them. The Conference began to ordain preachers by the imposition of hands in 1836, but Mr. Moore was not invited to take part in the ceremonial. The three ministers who first laid hands on the heads of young men received into full connection in 1836 were Jabez Bunting, president of the Conference; Richard Reece, ex-president; and Robert Newton, secretary of the Conference. Ordination in this way has been continued at every subsequent Conference, the officiating ministers being the president and secretary of Conference, the ex-presidents, some chairmen of districts, and occasionally the father, if a minister, who has a son to be ordained. The president, in giving a copy of the Bible to each, says, in substance, "Take thou authority to preach the word and administer the sacraments." This takes place not till after four years' satisfactory probation, and a thorough examination.

During the life of Mr. Wesley, preaching by the Methodists was held at five and nine in the morning, five in the afternoon, and eight in the evening, so as not to prevent any from attending service at Church. The Conference of 1786 gave consent to hold Methodist services in church hours when the minister was a wicked man or preached Arian doctrines, or when the churches could not contain half the people, or when the church was three miles distant. In such cases the preacher was directed to read the Psalms, Lessons, and part of the Church Prayers. All this was changed soon after Mr. Wesley's death, and more liberty was given to the preachers.

March 29, 1788, was a memorable day in the history of Methodism; Charles Wesley, the poet, entered into rest. He had no disease; "the weary wheels of life stood still." He was born in December, 1707, consequently was aged eighty years and three months. He wrote fully six thousand five hundred hymns and poetical pieces, but left his widow in such moderate circumstances with her three children that William Wilberforce, the Christian philanthropist, sent her yearly the sum of £60 as a gratitude-offering for the soul-comfort he had derived from her husband's hymns and sermons, and this was continued till her death, in December, 1822, at the age of ninety-six years. The death of Charles Wesley was more deeply felt by the founder of Methodism than any other event in the history of the Connection.

At the Conference following the death of his brother, Mr. Wesley took a review of the fifty years that had passed since his conversion, which event he considered to be the real beginning of Methodism. The sum of a long conversation was that the Methodists, in the course of fifty years, had neither premeditatedly nor willingly varied from the Church in one article, either of doctrine or discipline. That out of necessity, not choice, they had slowly varied in some points of discipline, by preaching out-of-doors, using extemporary prayer, employing lay preachers, forming societies, and holding annual conferences. These were all commenced as Providence opened the way.

The Conference of 1790 was the last presided over by Mr. Wesley. As if premonitory of his death, two committees were appointed, one to manage the mission newly established in the West Indies, and one to superintend the erection of chapels both in England and Ireland. A plan of the order of business in conducting the Conference was drawn up and published in the Minutes.

3. History of the Wesleyan Body since Mr. Wesley's Death.—The death of John Wesley, in March, 1791, was a blow so heavy when it occurred that it produced a feeling of awe and submission among the preachers, which prevented the introduction of various reforms for several years which had been contemplated and were required. During the whole year the Arminian Magazine scarcely named Mr. Wesley; more important duties devolving on both preachers and officers of the Connection. It was resolved to elect a president from the senior preachers at each Conference, and in other respects to carry on the Connection on the plan previously observed. England was divided into districts, and chairmen appointed to superintend them. The number of districts were, England, nineteen; Scotland, two; Ireland, six. By this plan the best possible arrangement was made for giving to the societies that careful oversight which they had previously received from Mr. Wesley himself. Each district was required to meet its own expenses.

A spirit of restlessness soon appeared among some of the societies after Mr. Wesley's death. William Hammett, whom Mr. Wesley had ordained to labor in the West Indies, went to America in 1792 in search of health. He made a division in the society at Charlestown, appealed to the English Conference, and the result was his exclusion from the ministry. In England, one at least of Mr. Wesley's ordained preachers assumed the title of reverend, wore a gown in the pulpit, and administered the Lord's supper without the consent of the Conference. During the three years following, much unrest was manifested in many parts of England by the people asking to have the Lord's supper administered by their own preachers instead of having to go to Church for the purpose.

In 1794 the trustees of some Methodist chapels, especially in Bristol, refused to allow any preacher to officiate in their chapel who had not previously been approved by them for that purpose. The dispute at Bristol ran so high as to threaten a division of the whole Connection.

In 1795 the dispute with the Bristol trustees, and the question of the preachers administering the Lord's supper to the societies, had created so much painful unrest that, to save a disruption, a plan of pacification was drawn up by nine preachers, which, when approved by the Conference, was submitted to the discontented trustees, and when accepted by them was sent to the societies, and was the means of averting for that year any division. The plan included nine points concerning public worship, and nine points concerning discipline. The concessions consisted mainly of authorizing the continuance of sacramental services by the preachers where they had been practiced without the consent of the Conference. Preachers and officers who spoke for or against the introduction of the Lord's supper were to be subject to trial and penalties. That clause was resisted so determinedly by a few preachers and by very many members, both in public addresses and by the wide distribution of pamphlets, chiefly written by Mr. Alexander Kilham, one of the preachers, that at the Conference of 1796 the first business done was the trial, and finally the expulsion from the ministry, of Mr. Kilham. Those who had the direction of the affairs of the Connection acted with determination in this matter, but many of the junior preachers and several thousand members considered that decision unjust, unwise, and impolitic.

The year between the expulsion of Mr. Kilham and the Conference of 1797 was passed by him in visiting the societies in various parts of England, to ascertain their views respecting the action of the Conference in his case. The result was the formation, in the summer of 1797, of a new Methodist Connection, which included at least three preachers from the old body and about five thousand members. That was the first division of the Methodist people after Mr. Wesley's death, and in thirty years it was followed by three others, all which might have been averted by the exercise of more Christian forbearance and the concession of points of discipline deemed "non-essentials," which have in later years been nearly all conceded by the Methodist Conference. The New Connection Methodists ought to be now united with the parent society, from which they should not have been separated. The three preachers who separated themselves from the Conference on that occasion were William Thom, Stephen Eversfield, and Alexander Cummin, all of whom assisted in forming the New Connection: The Conference of 1797 issued a pastoral address to the societies, to allay as much as possible the spirit of unrest which so widely prevailed. For over sixty years a pastoral address has been annually issued by the Conference, commencing with the year 1819.

The foreign missions of Methodism were considered and recognised by the Conference of 1798. Those missions were commenced by Dr. Coke in 1786, and were entirely under his direction and management till 1791, when the Conference appointed a committee of nine of the brethren to assist him in examining candidates for foreign service, and also the accounts and letters relating to the missions. The Conference of 1793 appointed the first general collection to be made throughout the Connection in support of the missions. The second collection was made in 1796, and it has been continued yearly ever since. These missions were under the control and management of Dr. Coke, with the aid, though little more than nominal, of a committee, until the year 1813, when he arranged with the Conference for his journey to India. The doctor closed his earthly pilgrimage while crossing the Indian Ocean, and in the following year the Foreign Missionary Society was originated at Leeds, since which time it has become one of the most useful and important missionary organizations in the world, with nearly five hundred ministers and one hundred thousand members in society at the Conference of 1880; the voluntary contributions reported at the annual meeting that year in support of the foreign missions being £165,498, while the expenditure of the year was £190,686.

A Committee of Privileges was appointed by the Conference of 1803, which then consisted of ten of the principal preachers and laymen in Methodism. Its origin dates from the threatened invasion of England by Bonaparte in 1802, when an act was passed in Parliament to raise a regular corps of militia. This included some Methodists; and a clause was introduced to exempt the Methodists from drill on the Sabbath. The Committee of Privileges was at first intended to act in defence of those rights. Its scope and numbers were enlarged in 1811, when the committee was appointed to have the direction of any lawsuit which in any way related to the Methodist Connection. Circuit collections were ordered to be made to meet the outlay which might occur in consequence of such legal proceedings. In 1853 the committee was established on a broader and more permanent basis, so as to include any legal contingency which might arise. It is now divided into two parts, one for guarding our privileges, the other for cases of exigency.

The Conference of 1804 resolved that any itinerant preacher who carried on any trade should, on proof thereof, be excluded from the "Itinerant Plan," and forfeit his connection with the ministry. This regulation excluded from the ministry the Rev. Thomas Rankin, one of the most respected and most prominent of Mr. Wesley's preachers, who, seeing that the allowance made to supernumerary preachers was wholly inadequate to their support, preferred to enter into business and become a coal-merchant rather than impoverish a fund already overtaxed. That act excluded him from the ministry, and at his death he had no record in the Minutes of Conference. An interesting memoir of him was printed in the Methodist Magazine.

A series of nine new minutes were agreed to by the Conference of 1807, the fifth of which was to the effect that camp-meetings may be allowable in America, but they are highly improper in England; and the Conference disclaimed all connection with them. Some of the earnest Methodists in Staffordshire were of opinion that if camp-meetings were good for America, they were equally good for England; accordingly, at Mow Coss, in that county, camp-meetings were held; and for taking part in them William Clowes, Hugh Bourne, and other Methodists were deemed unworthy of membership; and on being excluded, several of them united in forming the Primitive Methodist Connection in 1810, which has since become the most prosperous and most numerous offshoot from the parent society. Its members in 1880 numbered 190,800.

The first Methodist missionary was sent to Africa in the year 1811. Some Methodists had settled in the colony of Sierra Leone about the year 1792. Early in this century a colored man, named Mingo Jordan, preached to the people, gathered a society, and wrote to Dr. Coke and Dr. Adam Clarke, asking for help. The Conference of 1811 sent out George Warren as the first missionary to that colony.

Some Methodists, having made their way to the colony of Australia, formed a class, and found in one of the penal convicts who had become converted the first Methodist preacher in that vast country. The Conference of 1812 sent out Samuel Leigh, who laid in Australia, broad and deep, the foundations of a great Methodist Church, which numbered in 1880 fully 69,000 members.

In 1813 Dr. Coke started with a small band of missionaries to found the Methodist Church in India; and although it has been of slow growth, its branches are rapidly stretching over the continent of India. The work assumed wider proportions, and found many new fields after the Missionary Society was fully organized in 1813-14; since which time the agents of the society have found their way to nearly every country unde-heaven; and, aided by the American Episcopal Church and the Church South, Methodism is establishing itself in every land.

In October, 1815, what is now known as the Bible Christian Society was founded at Lake, near Shebbear, Devonshire, by William O'Bryan. He had been a very zealous Methodist local preacher; had visited many places in that country where the Gospel was not preached, and gathered the people together for religious worship. For doing just what Mr. Wesley had done seventy years before, an injudicious Methodist preacher expelled Mr. O'Bryan from their community; and he, not feeling at liberty to discontinue his evangelistic work, gathered some of his converts into a small society in Devonshire; and in one year their members numbered more than 500. In the year 1880 their membership in England was 21,292; in addition to those in Canada, 7254; and Australia, 3605. Mr. O'Bryan died in America a few years ago at an advanced age. Their membership is largely confined to the west of England, where the society originated.

In 1818, what is known as the Children's Fund was instituted. Previously to that date, each preacher having a family was allowed £6 per annum for each child, which sum was found to be inadequate. New arrangements were made in 1818 for raising more money, and for the better management of the fund. The allowance has been £7 for each child for half a century; but some circuits, by a special effort, make up the sum to £10.

In 1819 important improvements were made in the system of finance, and the Conference resolved that in future a financial district meeting should be held in the early part of the month of September in every district, at which all the preachers and stewards who could were to be present, to make whatever financial arrangements were required for each circuit in the district, for one year prospectively.

One of the most important acts done at any Methodist Conference was the passing of what have since been known as the Liverpool Minutes of 1820—a series of thirty-one resolutions, the design and purpose of which was “the increase of spiritual religion among our societies and congregations, and the extension of the work of God.” The reading of those resolutions to the society at any time since has usually been followed by renewed spiritual activity and success.

The year 1820 was memorable also for the resolution then passed to secure every four years an exchange of delegates between the English and the American Methodist Churches. The first delegate from America was John Emory, who was presented to the Conference at Liverpool in July, 1820; and who, in his address sketching the progress of Methodism in his own country, said, “The two bodies would yet compass the world, and shake hands at the Pacific.” That prophecy has been realized. Emory was a thin spare man of about thirty-five, but his presence and words made a deep impression on the Conference. He was the guest of Dr. Adam Clarke at Millbrook, who was then working hard at his Commentary. The first delegates from the British Conference to America were Richard Reece and John Hannah, who attended the General Conference held at Baltimore in 1824, where they met bishops McKendree, George, and Roberts, and one hundred and twenty-nine delegates.

The missions to the Shetland Islands were commenced by Dr. Adam Clarke in 1822, who found the chief means for their support for ten years, when he ceased from his labors. They now (1880) number more than twelve hundred members.

What is known as the Leeds organ dispute arose from the introduction of an organ into Brunswick Wesleyan Chapel in 1828 against the wishes of a large majority of the leaders and other officers of the society. The result was that more than one thousand members left Methodism, and formed the Society of Wesleyan Protestant Methodists. They existed as a useful, laborious Church for about eight years, when they united with a much larger secession from the old body.

In the Conference of 1834, the question of commencing an institution for the education and training of young ministers was considered and decided upon. Among the advocates for the measure were Messrs. Reece, Bunting, Newton, Subcliffe, Gault, Scott, Lessey, and one hundred and fifty other preachers. Against the proposal were James Wood, Dr. Samuel Warren, James Bromley, Henry Moore, and about thirty old preachers; one hundred other preachers remained neutral. Dr. Warren took the lead in the opposition; wrote and published a pamphlet against the proposal, which was considered by those friendly to the project to be such a misrepresentation of the facts as to bring the doctor to trial before a special district meeting. Dr. Warren was the superintendent preacher of the Manchester first circuit. The circuit defended their minister; the special district meeting tried, and suspended him from office as a preacher. An appeal was made to the Court of Chancery, when the vice-chancellor, Shadwell, declared against Dr. Warren; in consequence of which, at the Sheffield Conference of 1835, Dr. Warren was expelled from the Conference and the Connection. Having many friends and followers who sympathized with him, they left the Connection, and formed the Wesleyan Methodist Association, which, ten years afterwards, numbered 21,176 members. In 1857 they were united with the Reform Methodists of 1849–50.

The resolution of the Conference of 1834 to found a theological institution was carried into effect by the Conference of 1835–36. A committee was formed to complete the proposed scheme. An old Congregational building, known as the Hoxton Academy, was rented, and used with advantage for several years. In 1839, Abney House, in Stoke Newington, long the residence of Sir Thomas Abney and of Dr. Isaac Watts, was taken as a branch establishment; and both were used to their fullest capacity until the year 1841–42, when the handsome college at Richmond was completed; and about the same time the commodious institution of Didsbury, near Manchester, was also ready for occupation, when both were tenanted by the removal of the students from the two London buildings. Since then another college for the same purpose has been built at Headingley, near Leeds, and occupied fully; and a fourth college is now in course of erection at Handsworth, near Birmingham, which is to be opened in 1881.

The centenary of Methodism was celebrated in all parts of the world during the year 1839. The Conference of 1837 appointed a committee of ministers and laymen to prepare a report of the best way of observing the occasion. The report was presented to and accepted by the Conference of 1838, and a great Connectional representative meeting was gathered in Oldham Street Chapel, Manchester, Nov. 7, 1838, comprising two hundred and fifty preachers and laymen, and was the most imposing assembly of Methodists which had ever been held. Its deliberations were continued for three days. To commemorate its proceedings a large picture was painted, engraved, and published by Mr. Agnew, in which were included one hundred and four portraits. It is generally known as “The Centenary Picture.” Thomas Jackson presided. It surpassed all previous meetings for Christian feeling and pious beneficence. A Thanksgiving Fund was recommended as an acknowledgment for the great mercies of the past, and £80,000 was at first fixed upon as the limit expected from it. No less than £10,000 was promised at the meeting held in the City Road Chapel, London. Ireland generously promised £14,500; and by the opening of the centenary year the promises had reached £102,000; by March they were £150,000; and by the time the celebration was to be observed throughout the Connection—namely, Friday, Oct. 25—the promises had reached £200,000. Before the fund was closed, it amounted to £216,000. The objects to be benefited by the fund were: the erection of two Theological Institutions; the purchase of a Centenary Hall and Mission-house in London; the relief of distressed chapels; the better support of worn-out preachers and their widows; the building of a Centenary Chapel in Dublin; and to make provision for promoting day-school education. The Centenary Conference, 1889, reported an increase of membership of over 16,000, and 118 candidates for the ministry. The year after the death of Mr. Wesley, i. e. in 1792, the Methodist family numbered 550 itinerant preachers and 140,000 members in Great Britain and America: in 1839 these figures were raised to 5200 itinerant preachers and 1,171,000 members in society. In 1880 the total number of itinerant ministers throughout the Methodist world was 31,467; the total of ministers and members, 4,707,472. This record may be very appropriately closed with the memorable words of the dying Wesley—"What hath God wrought!"

In 1841 the Centenary grant of £2500 for educational purposes was made available for the founding of a training institution for elementary teachers and the establishment of primary schools throughout the Connection. The necessary funds for developing the work came in slowly. The Normal Training Institution and practicing schools in Westminster were opened in 1848. In 1857 there were 434 day-schools connected with Methodism, in which 52,630 scholars were taught. Ten years later there were 640 schools and 100,000 scholars. In 1880 there existed 851 schools and no less than 179,900 scholars. An additional training institution has also been established at Shortlands, Battersea, for females. The first principal of the Westminster institution was the Rev. John Scott, and the present principal is the Rev. Dr. Rigg. The principal at Shortlands is the Rev. G. W. Oliver, A.B.

The disruption which took place at the Manchester Conference of 1849 was the most sad and painful event that ever occurred in Methodism. A growing feeling of discontent had for some years been manifested by some of the preachers at what was considered by them a policy of dictation by some of the senior preachers, more especially by Dr. Bunting; and certain fly-sheets were printed and circulated throughout the Connection, in which the causes of complaint and dissatisfaction were embodied. The fly-sheets were anonymous. About the same time there was published a volume entitled Centenary Sketches of One Hundred of the Prominent Ministers of the Connection. That also was anonymous. The Conference of 1849 resolved to ascertain, by a system of rigid questioning, who among the preachers were the authors of the said publications. Several of the preachers refused to answer the question, Are you the author of the fly-sheets? Suspicion was mainly fixed on the Rev. James Everett, one of the senior preachers. He most resolutely declined to answer to the question of authorship of the delinquent publications, and he was excluded from the Connection for contumacy. The Rev. Samuel Dunn, another minister of about thirty years' standing, had commenced in 1849 a new monthly magazine, with the title of The Wesley Banner. He had not complied with an obsolete Methodist Conference rule which requires every preacher to publish works only through the book-room. The question of the authorship of the fly-sheets was put to him, and also the question whether he would discontinue The Wesley Banner. For refusing to answer those questions, he also was excluded from the Connection. The Rev. William Griffith, Jr., also refused to answer the question of authorship of the fly-sheets, and he also declined to promise that he would not report the proceedings of the Conference to a Wesleyan newspaper. For those offences he also was excluded. To those three ministers were afterwards added the Rev. James Burnley, the Rev. Thomas Rowland, and others. One result of those proceedings was that within two or three years more than 120,000 members of society had left the Connection, and had formed a new one under the designation of Wesleyan Reformers. During the same time the funds of the Connection had suffered so severely that the arrears three or four years afterwards amounted to about £100,000. The total membership of English Methodism in 1850 was reported at 358,277. It was not until twenty-five years afterwards that the membership again reached those figures, so that it required the labors of over one thousand paid ministers to recover the ground lost by those expulsions. Such a painful and costly experiment as was that of the Conference of 1849 is not likely to be ever again repeated. The Wesleyan Reformers had a separate existence until the year 1857, when they united with those who separated in the Warrenite division of 1835, and formed together the United Methodist Free Churches, having a membership in 1880 of 79,477. A few societies, which refused to amalgamate, form the Wesleyan Reform Union, with a membership of 7728. Two of the originally expelled ministers in 1849—Mr. Dunn and Mr. Griffith—still survive, enjoying a contented and happy old age. Thousands of members were altogether lost to Methodism and to the Christian Church in consequence of that disruption. The Reformers have uniformly laid the chief blame of the expulsions to the Rev. Dr. Bunting, but other prominent preachers were equally concerned in the business. One of the difficulties arising from the disruption was owing to so many trustees of chapels being severed from the society, and, further, the withdrawal of so large a sum of money from Connectional objects. To meet that emergency, the Conference of 1854 inaugurated what is now known as the Connectional Relief and Extension Fund. One hundred thousand pounds was promised to that fund in 1854, and the money was to be appropriated as loans to trustees of such chapels as were in difficulties, as gifts and loans to improve Church property, and to aid in the erection of new Methodist churches. The fund is now known by the title of Extension of Methodism in Great Britain, and at the Conference of 1880 the committee reported having assisted ninety-one chapels either in their erection or enlargement.

At the Conference of 1854 the Wesleyan Chapel Fund was established on a new and separate basis. The committee has to consider and determine all matters relating to the trust property of Methodism, and it carries out as far as possible the recommendations of the Extension Fund committee.

An important change in the management of the great sectional departments of Methodism was inaugurated when affiliated conferences were introduced. The first action was taken in 1847, when the two sections of the Methodist family in Canada were united and made into an independent Conference, but affiliated with the British Conference. The New Connection Methodists of Canada have since joined with them so as to make one united family in Canada. The French Methodist Church was made into an independent ecclesiastical organization in 1852, but affiliated to the British Conference. Australia, including New Zealand, Polynesia, and the islands of the Pacific, was in 1854 created an independent Conference, but affiliated to the British Conference. The provinces of Eastern British North America were created into a separate Conference in 1854, but affiliated to the British Conference.

In 1861 the Metropolitan Chapel Building Fund was inaugurated for the purpose of securing the erection of fifty new Methodist churches in and near London within the period of twenty years. Sir Francis Lyett (then Mr. Lyceot) gave the princely sum of £50,000 to commence the fund, with the proviso that a similar amount should be contributed throughout the Connection for the same object. The full number of fifty were not erected within the period specified, but the good work was so far advanced that Sir Francis generously gave a further £5000, shortly before his sudden death, Oct. 29, 1880, for securing the erection of five more chapels. One condition was that at least one thousand sittings were to be provided in each chapel.

The Conference of 1873 received under its fostering care an institution called the Children's Home, which was originated in Lambeth in 1869 by the Rev. Thomas Bowman Stephenson, A.B., and which had steadily developed into a large establishment for the education and training of destitute children. Its origin and history abound in interesting incidents. Having been originated by a Wesleyan minister, and supported mainly by the benevolence of the Methodist people, it began to be considered as a great Methodist orphanage, or home for the destitute. As an independent organization, it had expanded into four separate establishments—the Central Home, in Bethnal Green, London; a training institution at Gravesend; a farm school in Lancashire; and a Home in Canada, to which the children, when trained, are sent to be placed in service, and to get a good start in life. The Conference of 1873 recognised the institution as belonging to Methodism. Its Report is yearly presented to the Conference, and the same body appoints its officers. There were 489 children in the Homes at the Conference of 1880, and a new branch was to be opened at Birmingham. Its proper designation now is the Children's Home and Orphanage.

At the Conference of 1873 the Committee for the Promotion of Higher Education in Methodism was instructed to take the requisite steps for founding a college for Methodist children in the university city of Cambridge. The institution has been successfully founded, under the management of the Rev. W. F. Moulton, D.D., with the modest designation at present of the Leys School. It reported 100 pupils at the school in 1880, and its prosperity was most satisfactory.

Arrangements were made by the Conference of 1875 for the founding of a Wesleyan Methodist Sunday-school Union. The varied advantages of such an institution were recognised by the Conference, and during the year following the Union was formed, which established itself in 1876 in new premises in Ludgate Circus, London. At the Conference of 1880, the committee reported 6376 Methodist Sunday-schools in the Union—an increase of fifteen per cent. in ten years; 119,911 officers and teachers—twelve per cent. increase; and 787,143 scholars—an increase of twenty-four per cent. in ten years. It is in contemplation to erect larger and more convenient premises for the Union at an early date. The Rev. Charles K. Kelley is the clerical secretary of the Union, and its chief advocate and representative.

The most important historical event of the present generation of Methodists is the introduction of lay representation into the Conference. That was first determined upon by the Conference of 1877, and the whole scheme of the new arrangement occupies nineteen pages of the Minutes of that year. The Conference cannot legally extend beyond twenty-one days yearly. The first fourteen days are to be devoted to the Ministerial Conference, and the six week-days following, the Conference is to consist of 240 ministers and 240 laymen. All the members of the legal hundred are entitled to be present, and also secretaries of departments in Methodism, some chairmen of districts, and others. The lay representatives are to be all members of society and members of a circuit quarterly meeting. The conditions are specified with great care and minuteness. Fifteen subjects are reserved for the consideration of the ministerial conference only, and sixteen other subjects, chiefly of a financial character, are reserved for the consideration and determination of the Mixed Conference. The order and form of business are agreed upon, which embraces all the subjects likely to come under their consideration. The Conference of 1878 was the first at which the new plan was adopted. The harmony was complete. The experiment of ministers and laymen working together was a success of the highest character. As a mark of gratitude to God for the success of the first Representative Conference, four months after its close the Thanksgiving Fund was inaugurated, which has now reached in promises £292,000, but it is hoped the fund will reach £300,000. The conferences of all the offshoots of Methodism have from their origin consisted of ministers and laymen. The parent society was the last to try the experiment, and some persons were surprised that it was not a failure. This action on the part of the Wesleyan Conference was the first really aggressive step towards the union of universal Methodism. The Ecumenical Methodist Congress of 1881, to be held in London, will be the next important step towards the accomplishment of that object.

There are many minor points of Methodist history, which the limited scope of this article cannot include.

II. Doctrines.—The following brief outline contains a summary of the principal doctrines believed and taught by the people known as Wesleyan Methodists.

1. That there is one God, who is infinitely perfect, the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of all things.

2. That the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are given by divine inspiration, and form a complete rule of faith and practice.

3. That three Persons exist in the Godhead—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost—undivided in essence and coequal in power and glory.

4. That in the person of Jesus Christ the divine and human natures are united, so that he is truly and properly God, and truly and properly man.

5. That Jesus Christ has become the propitiation for the sins of the whole world; that he rose from the dead; and that he ever liveth to make intercession for us.

6. That man was created in righteousness and true holiness, but that by his disobedience Adam lost the purity and happiness of his nature, and in consequence all his posterity are involved in depravity and guilt.

7. That repentance towards God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ are necessary to salvation.

8. That justification is by grace through faith; and that he that believeth hath the witness in himself, and that it is our privilege to be fully sanctified, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and by the Spirit of our God.

9. That man's salvation is of God, and that if he is cast into hell it is of himself; that men are treated by God as rational, accountable creatures; that it is God that worketh in us to will and to do of his own good pleasure; and that we are to work out our own salvation with fear and trembling; that it is possible for man to fall finally from grace.

10. That the soul is immortal, and that after death it immediately enters into a state of happiness or misery.

11. That the observance of the Christian Sabbath is of perpetual obligation.

12. That the two sacraments, baptism and the Lord's supper, are institutions of perpetual obligation.

The doctrines of Methodism are explained in Mr. Wesley's Sermons, and in his Notes on the New Testament, which, with the small volume known as the Large Minutes, form the authorized standards of both doctrine and discipline. The doctrines preached by Mr. Wesley were those of the Church of England. When it became necessary for him to make a selection of them for the use of his followers, he printed them in a tract with the title Appeals to Men of Reason and Religion. The most complete summary of them, with Scripture proofs, will be found in the catechism used by the Methodists.

III. Constitution and Polity.—The Members of Society are the basis of Methodism. From among them are selected the preachers and all the officers of the Church. The preachers may be classed under the following heads: the president and secretary of the Conference, chairmen of districts, financial secretaries, official or located ministers, superintendents of circuits, ministers in full connection, ministers on trial, supernumeraries and superannuated ministers, local preachers and exhorters.

Official lay members are classified under the following heads: trustees, local preachers, class-leaders; circuit, society, chapel, and poor stewards; treasurers, secretaries, and members of committee of various institutions, superintendents and teachers of Sunday-schools, missionary collectors, and others.

The various meetings or assemblies recognised by the Methodists are: the Conference, which is Connectional; district and minor district meetings; and the following local or circuit meetings: namely, quarterly, leaders', local preachers', band, class, society, and prayer meetings, and love-feasts. These in addition to the usual public worship.

(I.) Officers.—1. Ministerial.—(1.) The president of the Conference is chosen annually. The names of three or more preachers who are members of the legal hundred are placed before the Conference, a ballot is taken, and the preacher having the highest number of votes is named to the legal hundred, by whom the choice is confirmed. The secretary is elected in the same manner. Both retain office till the next Conference, when the secretary may be re-elected. The president cannot be re-elected until after the lapse of eight years. The Rev. John Farrar is the only president re-elected during the past thirty years. The president is invested with the power of two members; he presides at all official meetings, supplies vacancies in the ministry, sanctions changes in appointments, and exercises a similar authority when the Conference is not sitting to that of a bishop in the Methodist Episcopal Church of America. He is the chairman of the district where he is located, a member of the Stationing Committee, and has an assistant appointed by the Conference to aid him in any possible duty.

(2.) The chairman of the district exercises the authority of a bishop, or overseer, in the locality to which he is appointed. He convenes and presides over the annual district meeting held in May, and the financial one held in September, at both which all the preachers residing in the district are expected to attend. He is responsible for the carrying-out of all the rules and usages of the Connection, the proper conduct of religious worship, the care of all the Methodist Trust property in the district, the payment of the preachers' salaries, the making of public collections and their proper distribution. He has to examine candidates for the ministry, and to direct what ministers are to attend the Conference. He has authority to visit any part of his district. He is chosen annually.

(3.) The financial secretary has to assist the general treasurers of the various funds to transact all the financial business of the district to which he belongs.

(4.) Official or Located Ministers.—These are principals or professors and tutors in colleges and seminaries, book stewards, missionary secretaries, secretaries of other Connectional agencies, editors, and house governors of theological colleges.

(5.) Superintendents are those ministers whose names stand first in the list of appointments to a circuit. The office constitutes such a minister chairman of all the circuit official meetings. He is responsible to the district meeting for the maintenance of order and discipline, and the administration of all its affairs. He admits and excludes members with the consent of the leaders, directs all the public services, meets the classes quarterly and gives each member a ticket, keeps a list of all the officers and members in society, registers deaths of members, collects statistical information, makes circuit plans, examines his colleagues in the ministry as to their religious experience, examines and instructs candidates for the ministry, has to distribute the books published at the book-room and to pay for the same quarterly, to appoint the collections, and see all moneys collected transmitted to the treasurers; and is responsible for every breach of discipline in the circuit.

(6.) Ministers in full connection are appointed annually to a circuit, but may be reappointed a second or a third time to the same circuit. They must not return to a circuit till they have been absent six years. They have to preach twice or thrice on the Sabbath, and on such week evenings as may be fixed by the superintendent on the circuit plan. They administer the sacraments, visit the members at their homes, especially those who are sick or infirm, and assist the superintendent in the general work of the circuit. They are entitled to be present at all society and district meetings. All such ministers were designated as Helpers during the lifetime of Mr. Wesley.

(7.) Ministers on Trial.—When a young man has been examined by the quarterly meeting and recommended therefrom as a minister on probation, he is sent usually to the district meeting, thence to the Conference, and, if accepted there, he may be sent for training to one of the four theological colleges, where he may remain one, two, or three years. A course of study is marked out for each year. He must pass a yearly examination and be well reported of by his examiners. The Conference has made satisfactory provision for his having a supply of suitable books and proper instruction in pursuing his studies. Probationers may attend quarterly and district meetings, but they may not vote. They may not administer the sacraments, excepting baptism in a case of great emergency. They may not marry while on trial. They are specially under the care of the superintendent until received into full connection, which is not till they have completed four years of probation. The act of being received into full connection is one of the most important in the career of a minister. Having passed several examinations with a good report, he is presented to the Conference. Two evenings during each Conference are set apart for this work. On the first the young men give an account of their conversion and call to the ministry, experience which is often attended with the manifest outpouring of the Divine Spirit on the audience, and they answer a few questions asked by the president. The young men are then formally and publicly received by the imposition of hands of the president, secretary, and several senior ministers in the legal hundred, the president saying, "Mayest thou receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a Christian minister, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands. And be thou a faithful dispenser of the Word of God and of the holy sacraments, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." After each young man has received the gift of a small Bible, the president says, "Take thou authority to preach the Word of God, and to administer the holy sacraments in our congregations." Shortly after that service, each preacher receives, as a certificate of his admission into full connection, a copy of the Large Minutes, in which are inscribed the following words, signed by the president and secretary of the Conference: "As long as you freely consent to, and earnestly endeavor to walk by, these rules, we shall rejoice to acknowledge you as a fellow-laborer." On the second evening, the ex-president delivers to the newly ordained a ministerial charge, which is usually printed. Most of the young ministers enter the married state a few days afterwards.

(8.) Supernumeraries.—Ministers who either from age or infirmity are unable to perform their circuit work are placed in this class. Many ministers are obliged to retire from the full work for one or more years to rest, and after recovery of strength resume circuit work. At the Conference of 1793 it was resolved that "every preacher shall be considered as a supernumerary for four years after he has desisted from travelling, and shall afterwards be deemed superannuated." All supernumerary or superannuated ministers are required to meet in class to retain their membership in the Methodist society. A superannuated minister ceases to be a member of the legal hundred; but this rule has been set aside by special vote of the Conference in recognition of some important Connectional service. A supernumerary who enters into business is not entitled to have his name retained on the journal of the Conference as a minister, and his death, if occurring while he is in business, is not recorded in the Minutes. The provision now made for supernumerary ministers and their widows is one of moderate competence.

(9.) Local Preachers, or Lay Preachers.—This class of workers is as old as Methodism itself. As early as the year 1738, Mr. Wesley had a lay helper named Humphreys, who left in 1739. In May, 1739, Thomas Maxfield was converted; he became Mr. Wesley's first lay helper in London, and John Cennick was the first lay helper in Bristol. From this body of men nearly all the ministers have been selected. Local preachers must be accredited members of society, men of piety, of consistent life, of good understanding, and fair ability as speakers. They generally begin by exhorting in cottage meetings or mission rooms, and when considered capable of addressing an audience they are, after preaching a trial sermon before a competent judge, admitted on trial and have appointments on the plan. They are examined as to their knowledge of doctrine and Church government and their call to the work. After a year's probation, and having passed satisfactory examinations at the local preachers' meeting, and been passed by the quarterly meeting of Church officers, they are received as accredited local preachers. Many, by the exercise of their gifts, soon qualify themselves for a wider sphere of ministerial work; others remain at home, following their daily occupations, and preach every Sabbath, often to large congregations, without any financial consideration. Lay preachers have always been held in much esteem in Methodism, and were thought so highly of when Mr. Wesley died that they had special notice in the inscription on the monument erected to the memory of the founder of Methodism, where he was described as "the patron and friend of lay preachers." Methodism for a full century was greatly indebted to the lay preachers for their services, valuable as teachers of divine truth, but especially so because rendered gratuitously. They have hitherto looked alone to God for their reward, and through their labors thousands of sinners have learned the way to God and heaven who would otherwise have lived and died destitute of the knowledge of both.

2. Official Lay Members.—(1.) Trustees.—The office of trustees in Methodism is one of great responsibility. They hold the property, mostly freehold, belonging to the Connection, in trust for the Conference, and are themselves responsible for the discharge of the debts connected with their respective trusts. During the lifetime of Mr. Wesley, there was diversity in the drawing of the trust-deeds, and, consequently, in the powers conferred thereby. All the property of the Connection is now vested in trustees according to the form of a model deed, which has been prepared with great care, and corrected from time to time so as to meet all emergencies which are likely to arise. Some trustees have had power to refuse the admission of any preacher to their pulpits whom they did not appoint or approve. The ecclesiastical powers of trustees are defined in the Plan of Pacification drawn up and published in the Minutes of Conference for 1794-95. The superintendent-minister is ex officio the chairman at all meetings of trustees, and has a casting vote. Trustees appoint their own stewards; they disburse seat-rents and collections taken in behalf of the trust, and keep the property in satisfactory repair.

(2.) Class-leaders.—These are persons of piety, intelligence, and ability, who are appointed to take charge of classes. The classes consist of the members of society divided into small companies, varying in number, according to circumstances, from six to sixty persons, either male or female, or sometimes mixed. The simple condition of membership is "a desire to flee from the wrath to come." Mr. Wesley himself was the first class-leader. The office of leader was not instituted until February, 1742, when the necessity for it was shown during a providential conversation at Bristol. During that year, leaders were appointed in London and elsewhere. The business of a leader is thus defined by Mr. Wesley, and published by him in the Rules of the Society:

1. To see each person in his class, once a week, at least, in order—

To inquire how their souls prosper.

To advise, reprove, comfort, or exhort, as occasion may require.

To receive what they are willing to give towards the support of the Gospel.

II. To meet the ministers and the stewards of the society once a week, in order—

To inform the minister of any that are sick, or of any that walk disorderly, and will not be reprov'd.

To pay to the stewards what they have received of their several classes in the week preceding, and

To show their account of what each person has contributed.

The original rule of Methodism was that each member contribute one penny weekly, and one shilling quarterly when the tickets of membership were given. Even at the beginning of Methodism, and throughout its whole history, there have been members who gave sixpence, or even one shilling, weekly, and five or ten shillings quarterly, some twenty shillings. Among the poor the original rule is the standing order. As early as 1748, leaders were recommended to meet in other classes to promote growth in grace. Leaders are really resident local pastors, and, as such, have in thousands of instances witnessed many most glorious and triumphant deaths. Leaders are chosen by the superintendent-preacher, and nominated by him at a leaders' meeting, the vote of the meeting fixing the appointment. Some good and useful leaders have been appointed at as early an age as sixteen years in times of special revival. Leaders are members of the quarterly meeting of society officers.

(3.) Circuit Stewards.—The most important of the circuit officers is the circuit steward, who manages all the finances. There are generally two in each circuit. They receive and pay all accounts, and report the items to each quarterly meeting. They are expected to attend the district meetings held in May and September. When ministers are invited to travel in a circuit, the steward makes the necessary arrangements. He is the official channel through which communications from a circuit are transmitted to the Conference. According to rule, the office of steward ceases at the end of the year, and no steward is to remain in office above three years in succession, except in some extraordinary cases. They are appointed to office by the quarterly meeting, on the nomination of the superintendent-minister.

(4.) Chapel stewards are appointed by the trustees to let and relet the sittings in a chapel, to receive the money for the same, and pay it into the hands of the treasurer for the trustees. They are expected to see that the chapel is kept in proper repair, to have it made ready for public worship, and to transact any business connected with the chapel which can be done without calling the trustees together.

(5.) Society stewards are intrusted with the financial affairs of a particular society. Where the members are few, only one is appointed, but two is the usual number. Their business is—

1. To attend the leaders' meetings; to examine the books of the leaders, and to receive the moneys which their members have contributed since the last leaders' meeting.

2. To prepare proper notices for the pulpit of all that is advertised upon the circuit plan, and to take care that other pulpit notices are duly signed.

3. To receive the preacher in the vestry before public worship, and to make such arrangements for the service as may be necessary, providing for the due celebration of the sacrament of baptism when it is appointed to be administered.

4. To see that the collections are made at the time specified upon the circuit plan, and to take charge of them until they can be delivered into the right hands.

5. To provide suitable homes, where needed, for preachers who officiate in their respective chapels, and to see that their expenses, if any, are paid.

They are chosen yearly on the nomination of the superintendent-minister, the leaders' meeting approving or rejecting as they see best. It is recommended that each society steward may be either changed annually, or one each year alternately, so as to retain one who knows the duties.

(6.) Poor-stewards receive and disburse the moneys given for the poor. The collections taken at the Lord's supper, and at love-feasts of the society, are thus distributed. They attend the leaders' meeting, and pay to the leaders any sums which are voted for needy or sick members, monthly or quarterly. A special collection is often taken on the first Sunday of the new year, which yields from five to ten shillings for each poor member. The poor-stewards provide the bread and wine for the Lord's supper, and the bread and water for the love-feasts. Preachers who have wine after preaching are supplied by the same stewards.

(7.) Treasurers, secretaries, and members of committee of the various institutions connected with Methodism are, to some extent, offices held by intelligent and respectable members of the congregations, who are not always members of society, but persons of integrity, whose consistent Christian conduct entitles them to the confidence thereby reposed in them. Many persons and families are by these means retained in Methodism who would be likely to drift into other communities of Christians, but for their being thus employed in the work. Persons so occupied generally find their way into society classes, and so become recognised members.

The teachers and elder scholars in our Sunday-schools render important services as collectors for the Foreign Missionary Society. Forty years ago a special effort was made to secure the services of the Sunday-school children as collectors, first of Christmas offerings. In this way, £4000 and £5000 was soon raised as free-will offerings at Christmas and at New-year's. Afterwards, those young persons were organized into a Juvenile Missionary Society, and by their aid a considerable sum is brought into the funds of the society. No less a sum than £16,567 was collected by the juvenile associations for 1880, which was one sixth of the entire ordinary income for foreign missions in that year.

(II.) Official Meetings.—1. The Conference is the highest court, and the only legislative body in Methodism. During forty years, all the power of the Conference was vested in Mr. Wesley. By the Deed of Declaration enrolled in chancery in 1784, the Conference was made to consist of one hundred preachers in connection with Mr. Wesley's society. In 1791 was held the first Conference after Mr. Wesley's death, and was the first organized according to the deed. By the provisions of that deed Methodism is made perpetual. The resolution of the Conference of 1791 was "to follow strictly the plan which Mr. Wesley left." This was done until the year 1814, when the Conference resolved upon two changes: first, to fill up one vacancy in four in the legal hundred, not by seniority, as previously, but by nominations from the whole body of preachers who have travelled fourteen years or upwards. Second, to give preachers of fully fourteen years' standing authority to nominate a preacher for election into the hundred, and also to vote in the election of Connectional officers. The legal hundred alone has to confirm such elections. From the time of Mr. Wesley's death to the year 1878, only preachers were permitted to be present at the Conference. Following the example so successfully set them by the General Conference of the M. E. Church in America, the English Conference of 1877 resolved to admit laymen to participate in their proceedings in such matters only as did not strictly belong to the ministerial office. The time for continuing the deliberations of the Conference is limited to twenty-one days. Two weeks are now devoted to the Ministerial Conference, and the third week to the Mixed Conference. This is composed of an equal number (240) of ministers and laymen. In this brief summary only an outline of the business of each Conference can be given.

The Ministerial Conference embraces the following items of business, namely:

1. Filling up vacancies in the legal hundred.
2. Election of president and secretary.
3. Appointment of Conference officers.
4. Public prayer-meeting for one hour.
5. Reports on probationers and candidates for the ministry.
6. Reception of representatives from other conferences.
7. Consideration of cases of character and discipline.
8. Appointment of committees.
9. Appeals, memorials, notices of motion.
10. Ordination of young ministers.
11. Supernumeraries.
12. Obituaries of ministers, with reminiscences.
13. Alterations and divisions of circuits.
14. Stations of ministers.
15. Statistics: reading pastoral address.
16. Conversation on the work of God.
17. Pastoral reports of colleges, schools, etc.
18. Book affairs, and review of literature.
19. Addresses to the Conference and replies.
20. Official appointments and deputations.
21. Reports and miscellaneous business.

The business of the Mixed Conference may be thus summarized:

1. Calling the roll, and address of the president.
2. Reception of memorials, and notices of motion.
3. Consideration of home and foreign missions.
4. Schools for ministers' children.
5. Extension of Methodism.
6. Funds relating to chapels.
7. The Children's Fund.
8. Home missions and Contingent Fund.
9. District sustentation funds.
10. Worn-out Ministers and Widows' Fund.
11. Theological Institution.
12. Education: General Committee, Sunday-school Union, and Children's Home.
13. Higher education.
14. Committee of Privileges and Exigency.
15. Conversation on the work of God.
16. Religious observance of the Sabbath.
17. Temperance.
18. Reports on memorials.
19. Miscellaneous business.
20. Reading and signing the Conference Journal.

2. District meetings originated at the first Conference after Mr. Wesley's death in 1791. They correspond very much to the annual conferences in the M. E. Church. Their deliberations occupy from two to five days. The business transacted may be thus briefly stated. At the session in May, when ministers only are present, inquiries are made regarding each minister and probationer as to moral and religious character, adherence to doctrine, attention to discipline, ability to preach, marriages, deaths, resignations, and whether fully employed; number of members in society; reports from Home Mission stations; conversation on the work of God; reports of examination of preachers on trial; examination of candidates for the ministry; who shall attend Conference. When the circuit stewards join the ministers, the funds are separately brought under consideration, much in the same manner as at the Mixed Conference, each circuit being brought under consideration. The district meeting is usually closed by a sermon from one of the leading preachers, and by the administration of the Lord's supper. The financial district meeting, held in September yearly, was originated at the Conference of 1819, when important changes were introduced into the system of finance. The finances of each circuit are arranged and determined for a year at that meeting.

3. Quarterly meetings, as their name indicates, are held in each circuit once in three months, about the time of the usual quarter days. All the stewards, class-leaders, and local preachers of at least one year's standing may attend. The superintendent-minister presides. A secretary records the names of those present, and the resolutions adopted, and any other business transacted. The statistics of membership are read; the stewards report the amount of moneys received from the classes, the salaries paid to the preachers, house rent, and other expenses, and the accounts are balanced each quarter. Conversations are held upon the progress of the work in each society, and reports of pioneer work detailed.

The quarterly meeting may be called a circuit Conference. The origin of these meetings dates from the first ten years of the history of Methodism; but the first time they were introduced by Mr. Wesley was at the Conference of 1749, though stewards were appointed and changed several years previously. After 1749 they became part of the economy of the Connection.

4. Leaders' meetings were originally, and for half a century, held weekly. Their purpose was to pay to the steward what money they had received from the members. For many years that money was distributed by the stewards among the poor. It now goes towards the support of the ministry. The meetings were used for receiving reports of sick and poor members, and also for giving such counsel and directions to the leaders as would be likely to promote the spiritual welfare of their classes, and the spread of the work of God. The superintendent-preacher presides, and no meeting of the leaders is legal without a preacher is present to preside. Since the death of Mr. Wesley the powers of the leaders have been increased considerably; they can veto the admission of members; leaders and stewards can be appointed or removed only with their consent; they also give consent for the administration of the Lord's supper, and for making special collections on the Sabbath for any benevolent purpose. In some circuits the leaders meet only once a quarter; where that is the case, they know but little of spiritual prosperity. The poor fund is distributed here.

5. Local preachers' meetings are usually held seven days before the quarterly meeting of the circuit. They are occasions of pleasant and profitable intercourse. After an hour spent in taking tea together, the superintendent-preacher presides, a secretary records the names of those present, and a summary of the proceedings. The names are called over, and inquiries made as to their appointments, especially when neglected. Probationers receive every kind of help and encouragement; any revivals, or evidences of either prosperity or adversity, are reported and considered. Occasionally new preaching stations are accepted, and young men are examined before them before being received on trial, and again before they are received on full plan. The services of local preachers are all gratuitous. A Yorkshire country local preacher, when asked what reward he received, said, "I preach for nothing a Sunday and keep myself." Local preachers are expected to confine their labors to their own circuits; they are all to meet in class, and are allowed to have from the book-room publications at the trade discount. According to rule, they may not hold love-feasts, but the rule is often broken.

6. Band meetings are the oldest society meetings connected with Methodism; but they have quite changed their original design. Band societies were established before Methodism had a separate existence. In December, 1738, Mr. Wesley drew up the Band Rules, which were printed and circulated. All who were justified by faith, who knew their sins forgiven, were urged to meet in band, and "to confess their faults one to another, and to pray for each other." It was a more strict or searching form of class meeting. For more than sixty years they were kept up in England; but in 1806 the Conference complained that fellowship meetings were taking the place of band meetings, and gradually they have done so: band meetings for personal examination and confession are almost unknown now; the meetings now held under that name are generally on the evenings of Saturday, as a preparation for the Sabbath, and they consist of singing, prayer, and the relation of personal religious experience. They are led by one of the ministers, and usually continue one hour, from eight to nine o'clock.

7. Class meetings may be said to be the origin as well as the life of Methodism. The first little company of persons who came to ask advice about their souls were met weekly by Mr. Wesley himself. This kind of meeting of persons who were desirous to "flee from the wrath to come, and to be saved from their sins," were continued through the years 1740-41, and till February, 1742, when classes were organized, first at Bristol, then at London, and soon after throughout England. Their original purpose was to raise funds to discharge a chapel debt; then to help the poor; but their weekly meetings were productive of so many spiritual blessings that Mr. Wesley introduced them wherever a society could be formed. In May, 1743, he published the first edition of the Rules of the society. Class meetings are under the direction of a leader, who has under his or her care from six to twenty, or even as many as sixty persons, who meet once a week for mutual edification and encouragement. The members relate their religious experience, hear each other's progress in the divine life, and receive from the leader suitable counsel and direction. These meetings have no resemblance to the confessional of secret orders. The meetings are of a purely social character, and, to render them profitable, candor and simplicity are blended with faithfulness and affection. The members contribute each at least one penny weekly towards the support of the ministry.

8. Society meetings are convened by the preacher, and consist of members of the society usually. After singing and prayer, the preacher delivers an address respecting their religious duties, Christian experience, and general conduct. The rules of the society are occasionally read and expounded, and their principles enforced. Seriously disposed persons are permitted to be present, and they are invited to become members of society. These meetings are frequently held on Sunday evening after the usual public worship. They are held to stimulate members to meet in class when there have been neglect and indifference manifested.

9. Love-feasts are a revival of a custom practiced by the early Christian Church. They are conducted by a minister, who, after singing and prayer, desires the stewards to give to each person a small piece of bread or cake and a drink of water, after which a collection is made for the poor. The minister then relates his Christian experience, and those present follow him in giving their own experience. About two hours are occupied for these meetings; they are usually held quarterly, soon after the visitation of the classes, when the tickets of membership are given. Those tickets entitle their owners to attend class and society meetings, band meetings and love-feasts.

10. Prayer meetings are appointed by the superintendent of each circuit. They are open to the public, and are held at such times as best suit the convenience of each locality. One should be held in each society at seven o'clock on Sunday morning; in some places one is held for half an hour before the evening service, and again after the evening service. One week-day evening is devoted for one hour for public prayer, and once a month, generally the first week of the month, home and foreign missions are specially prayed for. Much good has been done by holding such meetings in cottages, with the permission of their occupants. A monthly prayer meeting held by Sunday-school teachers and the older scholars has been a great blessing in many schools; and in other ways the union of officers and members with the public in such meetings has been the cause of many revivals. The first meeting in the month of society classes is generally a prayer meeting instead of an experience meeting; by this means many gain that confidence which they need to encourage them to pray in the larger gatherings. In some places members are employed as prayer-leaders, to conduct such meetings in cottages, halls, warehouses, and factories. Cases are on record of very poor persons, who had a remarkable gift in prayer, acquired by close and frequent communion with God in private, having been made a special blessing in the locality where they resided, and often revivals of religion have resulted from their persistent devotion to prayer. Any church which has well attended prayer-meetings, and earnest short prayers from many members, is sure to be in great prosperity. Prayer is power, and gives courage and strength.

These notices on the rules and ordinances of Methodism are an original compilation from William Peirce's Principles and Policy of the Wesleyan Methodists; Minutes of Conference; and the personal experience of a fifty years' membership in the society.

IV. Statistics (numbers of members, etc.).—1. Statistics of English Methodism.—During twenty-five years from the origin of Methodism no records or "Minutes" of Conference were published; and if any statistics were taken of the societies generally, they have not been printed, excepting part of those relating to the society in London. The year 1766, which witnessed the commencement of Methodism in America, was memorable also as that in which the first record was printed of the number of Methodists meeting in class in England. From that year we have a continuous record to the present time.

V. Institutions and Funds.—(L.) Schools.—There are four theological institutions in England for the training of young men for the ministry. In official documents they are described as institutions, but they are commonly called colleges. Their names are as follows:

1. Richmond Branch was erected in 1840-41 largely out of the Centenary Fund, and opened in 1842. It is a very handsome range of buildings, situate on the top of Richmond Hill, about twelve miles from London. Its present staff of officers is as follows: George Osborn, D.D., theological tutor; Daniel Sanderson, house governor; Frederick P. Napier, A.B., and George G. Friedlay, A.B., classical tutors; William H. Findlay, A.B., assistant tutor.

2. Didsbury Branch, erected in 1842-43, partly out of the Centenary Fund, is situated a short distance from Manchester, and was opened in 1843. The following are its staff of officers: William Burt Pope, D.D., theology; William Jackson, house governor; John Dury Geden, Hebrew and classics; Alfred J. French, A.B., mathematics and philosophy; George Armstrong Bennetts, A.B., assistant tutor.

3. Headingley Branch was erected in 1866-67 (and opened 1868) partly by a grant of £12,000 from the Jubilee Fund of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. It is situated a short distance from Leeds, Yorkshire, and was at first intended for the training of young men for the foreign missionary work. That design has since been changed, and the Richmond Branch is now used for missionary students, as being nearest to the Mission House in London. Its present staff is as follows: John Shaw Banks, theology; Benjamin Hillier, house governor; Robert Newton Young, classical tutor; Edward H. Sugden, A.B., and William Foster, A.B., assistant tutors.

4. Birmingham Branch, erected partly out of a handsome gift of £10,000 by a gentleman residing in that locality, Solomon Jevons, is now (1880) in course of erection. The site of the new college is a fine estate of seventeen and a half acres, adjoining the suburb of Handsworth, in the midst of an undulating and well-wooded tract of country, about three miles from Birmingham. The college, of which the memorial stones were laid in June, 1880, by the president of the Conference, Sir Francis Lycett, William Mewburn, Isaac Jenks, and James Wood, is to be completed and opened for the reception of students in September, 1881, at a cost of about £24,000. The buildings include studies and bedrooms for seventy students, a library, large lecture-hall and five smaller lecture-rooms, dining-hall, all necessary offices and servants' apartments, and a residence for the governor. Detached houses for the theological and classical tutors are also in process of erection on the site. The style of architecture is founded upon the Gothic of the 15th century.

5. The Leys School (Cambridge).—This school has recently been established in the belief that a school in the immediate neighborhood of one of our great universities would enjoy special educational advantages. While the general teaching and discipline are in the hands of resident Wesleyan masters, classes in various subjects are committed to the care of able visiting masters. The Rev. Dr. Moulton, one of the New-Test. revisers, is the head-master and principal.

6. Primary Education.—It was not until about the year 1846 that the Wesleyan Conference would take action in promoting the establishment of elementary day-schools. In 1851 the first Normal College and Practising School was opened in the city of Westminster. It has been a great success, and is now divided into two branches for male and female teachers.

7. Westminster Training College was opened Oct. 7, 1851, and adapted for male students only in January, 1872. During the year 1879 120 students were in training, all of whom passed the certificate examinations at Christmas, 1879. The college accommodates 131 students, and 117 are now (1880) in training. The expenditure of the college for the year ending Dec. 31, 1879, was £7984 0s. 3d., and of the practicing schools £2233 5s. 2d.

8. Southlands Training College (Battersea, near London), for female students, was opened Feb. 26, 1872. During the year 1879 106 students were in training, all of whom passed the certificate examinations at Christmas, 1879. The college will accommodate 109 students, and 109 students are now in training. The cost of the college for the year ending Dec. 31, 1879, was £4271 18s. 10d., and of the practicing schools £654 5s. 6d. The number of Wesleyan day-schools in England in 1880 was 851; the number of day scholars, 179,966.

9. Wesley College (Sheffield) was opened in 1838. In 1844 it was constituted, by her majesty's warrant, a college of the University of London, and empowered to issue certificates to candidates for examination for the degrees of bachelor of arts, master of arts, bachelor of laws, and doctor of laws. The directors award a scholarship of the annual value of £40 (tenable for one year) to the youth who shall be certified as the best pupil of his year at Woodhouse Grove School. The Holden scholarship, also of £40 per annum, is usually given to Kingswood School. Two others of £20 a year each, given by the late P. Spooner, are open to boys resident in Sheffield. The late Sir Francis Lycett also established two scholarships (tenable for two years) of the annual value respectively of £50 and £30. These are held by the two students from Wesley College who stand highest in the honors' list of the London University at the matriculation examinations coinciding with the time when the scholarships fall due. The college is examined and reported on biennially by the syndicate of Cambridge, which is appointed by the University for the examination of schools.

10. Wesleyan Collegiate Institution (Taunton).—This institution was founded thirty-eight years ago, in 1842, the object of its founders being to secure a sound literary and commercial education, combined with religious instruction in harmony with the principles of the late Rev. John Wesley. In 1846 it was also made, by royal charter, one of the colleges of the University of London, and degrees in arts and laws are open to all its students.

11. Schools for Ministers' Children.—The Schools' Fund was instituted by Mr. Wesley, in order to provide for the education of the children of Wesleyan ministers, and he commended it to the liberal support of his people in the most forcible terms. The collections and subscriptions for the Schools' Fund are made in the early part of November. Out of it the four schools for the education of ministers' children are supported, and an allowance is made for the education of those for whom there may not be room in the schools. These allowances are only made for children between the ages of nine and fifteen.

The general committee consists of the governing body of the New Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove School, the governing body of the School for Girls, and seventeen other ministers and laymen.

(1.) For Boys.—The governing body of the New Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove School consists of the president and secretary of the Conference, the ex-presidents, the general treasurers and secretaries of the Schools' Fund, the chairman of the Bristol, Bath, Halifax and Bradford, and Leeds Districts; the governors and the head-master of the school; and ten ministers and thirteen laymen named by the Conference.

New Kingswood School is situated at Landsdown, Bath, and was opened in 1851. Old Kingswood School, near Bristol, was founded by the Rev. John Wesley, A.M., in 1748. It is now a Reformatory School for young criminals in connection with the nation.

Woodhouse Grove School was established in 1811.

(2.) For Girls.—The governing body of the Schools for Girls consists of the president and secretary of the Conference, the ex-president, the general treasurers and secretaries of the Schools' Fund, the general treasurers and secretary of the Children's Fund, the chairman of the Second London and Liverpool districts, the local treasurers and secretaries, and fifteen other ministers and laymen.

Queenswood School (Clapham Park) is near London. The executive committee consists of ten members.

Trinity Hall School (Southport) is near Liverpool. The executive committee consists of ten members.

(II.) Other Institutions.—1. The Wesleyan Chapel Committee was instituted in 1818, and reconstituted in 1854. The committee, consisting of an equal number of ministers and laymen, usually meets on the first Wednesday of each month to dispose of loans and grants; to determine on erections, alterations, purchases, and sales of Wesleyan trust property, including organs; and to afford advice on difficult cases. The income from all sources in 1879 was £9148 9s. 1d. The total number of applications for permission to erect or enlarge chapels, schools, and organs, which have received the conditional sanction of the committee in 1879-80, including 97 modifications of cases previously sanctioned, is 341. The estimated outlay is £253,655. Two hundred and ninety-seven erections and enlargements have been completed during the year at a cost of £318,175. The entire temporary debt left on this large outlay is £75,807, most of which will be paid off in a few years. The entire amount of debts which have been discharged or provided for during the last twenty-six years is £1,482,359.

2. Metropolitan Chapel Building Fund (instituted in 1862).—This fund originated from the generous gift of the late Sir Francis Lycett of £50,000 towards the erection of fifty Methodist churches in London during twenty years. Sir Francis in 1880 gave £5000 more towards the erection of ten additional chapels. Shortly afterwards he died, after only ten days' illness. The secretary of the fund is the Rev. Gervase Smith, D.D.

3. Itinerant Methodist Preachers' Annuitant Society.—This institution was formed at Bristol in 1798, revised in Leeds in 1837, and revised again in London in 1860, and is the same which is often called among the Methodists "The Preachers' Fund." It was formed by some of the preachers for the relief of supernumerary and superannuated preachers among themselves and of their widows, and is supported by donations and legacies, but chiefly by the payments of the members themselves. The annual payment is now by preachers on trial, £5 5s.; by ministers in the home work, £6; and by ministers on foreign stations, £10 4s.

4. Besides these agencies, there exists also a separate mission to seamen in London, chaplains to portions of the army and navy, and a lay mission, each under distinct management, for London, Manchester, and Liverpool. Since 1875 the temperance movement has been recognised by the Conference, and circuit societies and bands of hope are rapidly forming throughout England. There are also committees of privilege and exigency, and those for the promotion of the religious observance of the Sabbath.

5. A Sunday-school Union was established in 1874, and the total number of schools in union in 1880 was 2629 out of 6376 belonging to the Connection. The secretary is the Rev. Charles H. Kelly. The office and depository for the present is situated at Ludgate Circus, in the city of London.

6. The Children's Home—Orphanage, Refuge, and Training Institute—originated at Lambeth in 1869, has now four branches, and a fifth is in preparation.

London Branch.—Bonner Road, Victoria Park, E.

Lancashire Branch.—Wheatshaf Farm, Edgworth, near Bolton.

Canadian Branch.—Hamilton, Ontario, Canada.

Certified Industrial Branch.—Milton, Kent.

Orphanage Branch.—Birmingham. Preparing.

This institution exists for the nurture and education of orphans and destitute children. It has been sanctioned and commended to the Christian public by several resolutions of the Conference, to which body the committee of management is annually submitted for approval. At present five hundred children are in the Home, and nearly as many have been sent forth into the world, and the reports received concerning the great majority of them are highly satisfactory. The Home is also a training institute for Christian workers, especially with the view of preparing godly men and women for work in orphanages, industrial schools, children's hospitals, and similar institutions.

7. Conference Office and Book-room (2 Castle Street, City Road, London) was instituted by the Rev. John Wesley. It was formed by him for the publication and sale of his works. On his death he vested his property in the book-room, consisting of books, copyrights, etc., in trustees "for carrying on the work of God in connection with the Conference." The whole of the proceeds of this institution is devoted to the support and extension of Wesleyan Methodism in Great Britain and Ireland.

8. Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society (Centenary Hall, Bishopsgate Street Within, London).—Missions were commenced in 1786, and the society organized in 1816. The committee of management consists of the president and the secretary of the Conference, the general treasurers, the general secretaries, the honorary secretary, the governor and tutors of Richmond College, the Connectional editor, the lay treasurers of the Richmond institution, the London district treasurer, and of fifty-two other members, viz., sixteen from the country circuits and thirty-six resident in London: four of the latter go out annually by rotation, and four of the former are also changed each year. Every person subscribing annually one guinea or upwards, and every benefactor of £10 and upwards, is deemed a member. The Wesleyan missions were commenced in 1786, and were, until 1813, confined chiefly to British North America and the West Indies. In the December of that year, however, Dr. Coke, accompanied by a band of young missionaries, embarked for India. Up to this period, Dr. Coke had mainly raised the funds needed to carry on the Methodist missionary operations. The additional evangelistic enterprise now entered upon made new arrangements and exertions necessary. Various plans were suggested; but that which originated with the late Rev. George Morley and the late Rev. Dr. Bunting, then stationed at Leeds, and sanctioned by several of the ministers in that town and neighborhood, was adopted by the ensuing Conference. That scheme has been greatly owned of God. In 1814 the income of the Missionary Fund was below £7000; there were 70 missionaries, and the number of members under their care was 18,747. Now there are, according to the last returns in 1880, 92,527 accredited Church members, besides 10,885 on trial for membership, under the care of 519 missionaries; and the income is £165,498 12s. 8d., inclusive of £37,622 4s. 11d. received from the Thanksgiving Fund. The expenditure in 1879 was £148,107 6s. 10d. The legacies for 1879-80 amounted to £4966 15s. 3d. The Ladies' Committee for Female Education in Heathen Countries expended £2296 1s. 6d., besides supplying clothes, etc., for charitable purposes.

9. The Home Mission and Contingent Fund was instituted in 1756 and remodelled in 1856. The committee consists of the president and the secretary of the Conference, the ex-presidents, the treasurers, the general secretary and the financial secretary of the fund, the treasurers and secretary of the Fund for the Extension of Methodism in Great Britain, with fifteen ministers and fifteen laymen for London, and thirty-five ministers and thirty-five laymen for the country. The secretary is the Rev. Alexander McAulay. This fund is to assist the dependent circuits in maintaining the ministrations of the Gospel, to provide means for employing additional ministers, and to meet various contingencies. It is mainly supported by the yearly collection, by the Home Missionary collections made after sermons and meetings, and by subscriptions, legacies, and juvenile associations. The total income of the fund in 1879 was £33,314 8s. 9d., and the total expenditure £33,318 12s. 10d.

VI. Literature. This is copiously exhibited in Osborn's Wesleyan Bibliography (Lond. 1869, 8vo). See also Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis (Ottawa, 1867, 8vo); and compare METHODISM. (G. J. S.)

Wesna, in Slavonic mythology, is a sister of Morana: they represent spring and winter, or life and death, under whose protection human life stands. Wesna guards the beginning of life, Morana its end. She rocks men to sleep with beautiful hymns and suitable pictures.

Wessel, Johann (1), was unquestionably the most important among the men of German extraction who helped to prepare the way for the Reformation. The circumstances connected with his private life are involved in great uncertainty, inasmuch that even his names have been made the subject of inquiry (John, Hermann; Gansevoort, Basilus). He was born in 1400 or 1420, probably the latter year. His birthplace was Groningen, where the very house in which he was born is yet shown. He was orphaned at an early age, but received into the house of a kinswoman named Oda or Odilla Clantes, and sent to a school at Zwoll, which was conducted by the Brothers of the Common Life, and had a good reputation. He there not only devoted himself to scientific pursuits, but also to the promotion of the religious life, being aided in the latter respect by Thomas à Kempis, who sojourned in the neighborhood of Zwoll. In time he came to fill the place of an under-teacher, but unpleasant surroundings and a thirst for greater knowledge drove him away from Zwoll to Cologne, where he studied Greek and Hebrew, chiefly under the direction of private tutors, and also examined the libraries. His habit was to note the results of his readings and impressions in memoranda, which he continued to keep to the end of his life. The independence of thought which such a method of study displayed was yet further cultivated by the study of Plato, the great antagonist of scholasticism and agent in the restoration of theology, and the simple and unadorned mystic Rupert of Deutz (q. v.). It was not possible, however, that he should find in bigoted Cologne a soil suitable for the propagation of his views. A call to Heidelberg was extended to him, but he was not yet ready to devote himself exclusively to the work of teaching, and felt himself attracted to Paris, where the controversy between nominalists and realists had broken out afresh. He paused for a little while at Louvain, and then hastened to Paris, actuated by the desire to gain his countrymen Henry of Zomerén and Nicholas of Utrecht, both famous professors, over to realism; but the end was that he became a nominalist himself, and continued to be such while he lived. He remained in Paris about sixteen years, not sustaining an altogether receptive attitude, but doing his part to shape the mind of the coming generation. He was most powerfully stimulated by association with cardinal Bessarion, Rovere, then general of the Franciscans, but afterwards pope Sixtus IV, and with younger men like Reuchlin and R. Agricola. He visited other French cities also, e. g. Angers, in order to take part in disputations, and two years before the close of the pontificate of Paul II came to Rome. Here he found the most advanced culture of the time, but also the most evident and shocking corruption in the Church. On his return to Paris he witnessed the attempt of Louis XI to put down nominalism by force. In 1475 he was at Basle with Reuchlin, and later at Heidelberg as a member of the philosophical faculty. His combativeness as a debater had in the meantime earned for him the title of Magister Contradictionum. He soon afterwards retired to privacy in his native town of Groningen, and spent his remaining days in arranging his views into a defensible form, and in the cultivation of a profound piety. All the works from his pen which we possess were probably written in this period, when the mystical trait in his nature was becoming prominent. He is said to have been the physician of the bishop David of Burgundy, and in a former period of Rovere (see above), which circumstance probably deterred the inquisitors of Cologne from proceeding against him, as they did against J. von Wesel (q. v.), and as Wessel thought they would. He maintained a large correspondence and received many visitors. He also contributed much towards the formation of the characters of R. Agricola, Alexander Hegius, Hermann Busch, etc., with reference to whose influence in the future he predicted that his young friend Oestendorp would live to see the time when scholasticism, i. e. the teachings of Aquinas, Bonaventure, etc., should be rejected by all truly Christian divines. Before he died he was assailed by doubts respecting all the verities of the Christian faith, with which he struggled almost despairingly, but which he conquered with the cry, "I know nothing but Jesus, the crucified one." He died in peace, but without having received the papal absolution, Oct. 4, 1489, and was buried in the Church of the Nunnery at Groningen. After his death the mendicant monks subjected his writings to their rage, and probably destroyed a portion of them, though a sufficient quantity of them was preserved by the devotion of his pupils to enable us to estimate the character of the man. The first collection was published by Luther, omitting an essay on the Lord's supper, which was added for the first time in the Groningen edition of 1614.

Wessel's career was largely determined by the fact that he was never bound by any vow, official station, or other similar obligation; so that while he was greatly interested in the conditions of the Church and the school, it was yet possible for him to be to some extent an independent observer. He was thus able to command the leisure required for a thorough examination of the matters he discussed, and the calmness essential to scholarly polemics. It must be added that he was naturally endowed with an independent spirit and sound judgment. Neither the superstitions of the Church nor the mysticism of the Brothers of the Common Life could overturn his balanced mind.

The writings of Wessel do not constitute a system. His method was somewhat aphoristical, involving the discussion of separate theses, and not affording any one central, fundamental principle from which the whole of his position might be understood. They hold a ground intermediate between scientific discussion, ascetical application, and reformatory polemical exhortation. His theology, like that of Zwingli, is largely determined by Platonism. The principal work he has furnished in this department is the De Providentia Dei, which conceives of God as the absolute cause, or, in other words, as independent Being. The pantheistic tendency of this idea of God is not sufficiently guarded against, but finds its rectification in the emphasis which Wessel elsewhere lays upon the idea that God is pure Being, distinct from and above the world. In the doctrine of the Trinity the Father is the divine wisdom, the Son the divine reason, the Spirit the divine love. The Deity is the creative life, the original idea, which is necessarily active and compelled to glorify itself. This glorifying of the divine nature constitutes the Son, the λόγος πρῶτος; and in order that both may not be unemployed, the self-conscious and self-glorifying Being must also eternally love himself. In anthropology man is conceived of as being in the likeness of God, as respects his inner nature. The parts of the divine image are mens, intelligentia, and voluntas (De Purgatoria, 80 b); and each of these parts is, it would appear, held to be incessantly subject to the divine influence. He locates the divine image even more particularly in the human will, which is free, and which is sharply distinguished from the intellect and the desires. In discussing the Ego, Wessel defines personality as being the fruitful source from which spring the will, the judgment, self-consciousness, etc., and remarks that man has in his personality the ability to transform the naturally existing relation between the Divine Spirit and the human into an ethical relation, an immediate consciousness of God being implanted in him; and that he is under obligation to effect this change. In soteriology he places the origin of sin in the angel-world, but does not account for its transfer into the world of men. It would even seem that he regards it as an inherent factor in the constitution of man, since it is to him merely debitum. Adam and Eve were far from being perfect while in Eden, and needed, even if temptation had been resisted, development in every side of their nature. It is difficult to see how this undeveloped state could be other than a sinful state under his definition. He recognises a moral depravation as having been added in the fall, but makes it amount to a mere infirmity, which does not extend so far as to destroy the freedom of the will, though it unfits man from attaining to his rightful goal. Grace is necessary and the only means of salvation, because it was required for human well-being from the beginning.

Redemption is a process which required that Jesus should be the "express image" of God. Christ, as the source of life, was mediator from the beginning. He was from all eternity appointed to be the king and head of an empire, which is in no sense a merely social organization, but in which he is the life of all its members and is himself the end for which it exists. In the atonement Jesus died for us and made satisfaction to God. The process of redemption is, however, constantly described by Wessel as a conflict in which the Lamb is not regarded as taking upon himself the wrath of God, but as resisting the assaults of the devil, who is empowered to wage war and is assisted therein by God. The death of Jesus is then conceived as the completion of the life-long struggle. His victory consists, on the one hand, in the subjugation of the devil, who is unquestionably regarded as the personification of the power of evil, and, on the other, in the demonstration afforded by this triumph that he is the testator of the New Test. in his death and in his evident drawing of all men to himself in his righteousness and love. His merits as redeemer are superabundant, for he is the consummation of the race, and in his capacity as head and redeemer has more to offer than man possessed before the fall.

The condition of salvation is faith in God, based on the word of Christ. Justification is distinguished from the remission of sins, and conceived of as the positive act of renewing in righteousness through a union with Christ and the Trinity by faith. God regards man as being positively righteous in Christ, though not for Christ's sake. This is stated in a different light when Wessel teaches that faith does not lay hold upon the work of Christ, but upon his life-giving person. This union having been formed, faith melts into love, and good works may appropriately be said to flow from either quality. Remission of sins is nowhere allowed an independent place in Wessel's theological system. Repentance is not with him sorrow for the sins of the past, but is, in substance, conversion or freedom from sin. It is a matter of the will rather than of the feelings.

Upon the doctrine of the Church Wessel differed from Wycliffe and Huss in that he did not define the Church to be a communio prædestinorum, but a communio sanctorum. The circumstances of his age obliged him to look for the visible Church within the papacy, and he accordingly conceded a jurisdictio papalis; but he restricted its operations altogether to externalities, and denied that a papal excommunication has power to control God. He even asserted that a pope is entitled to be the director of the faith of the Church only when his own faith is correct; and he rated the authority of the universities higher than the authority of the clergy. But he esteemed the Scriptures even above the universities, and addressed to them the final appeal. The Scriptures, he held, are simply the Holy Ghost speaking to man. They are clear and self-explanatory and also sufficient. Tradition, however, was not rejected, and the regula fidei was apparently placed on an equality with Scripture by him.

With respect to the sacraments, Wessel denied that they are of themselves effectual means of grace. The infusion of love into the heart constitutes true baptism, and God is himself the administrator, according to his view; the priest, of whatever degree he may be, is simply a minister, and not able to contribute anything whatever to the gracious power of the sacrament. The sacrament of penance was not allowed by him to possess any vital connection with inward purification, and the priest's agency in connection with it was limited to the calling-forth of proper dispositions through the employment of instruction, exhortation, etc. This view carried with it the rejection of indulgences as a matter of course, for they were the fruitage of the sacrament of penance as held by the Church. Wessel does not hesitate to term them swindles, and plenary indulgences abominations. In connection with the Lord's supper, he contended against the opus operatum, or bringing of masses in behalf of particular individuals. He held that the mass has value for him who hungers and thirsts for the bread of life, the eating of which constitutes the sole value of the sacrament. The idea of sacrifice has no place whatever in his view.

In eschatology Wessel held firmly to the existence of purgatory, but as a place of purgation rather than satisfaction. The fire which burns there is the fire of piety, and, more particularly, of love. Christ himself is there to preach his Gospel among the dead, and to make of purgatory a place of delights. Wessel did not paint the state of the lost, and therein left his description incomplete.

The fanatical hostility of the mendicant monks prevented the immediate publication of Wessel's writings. Luther's collection of these writings, entitled Farrago Rerum Theologicarum Uberima, appeared in 1521, and was followed by repeated editions in 1522 and 1523. The last edition was that of Strack (Giessen, 1617), following a complete edition of Wessel in 1614. The Farrago contains the following books: De Benignissima Dei Providentia; De Causis, Mysteriis et Effectibus Dominicæ Incarnationis et Passionis; De Dignitate et Potestate Ecclesiastica; De Sacramento Penitentiae; Quæ sit Vera Communio Sanctorum; De Purgatorio; and a number of letters, among which one, De Indulgentiis, addressed to Hoeck, deserves special mention. The complete edition contains, in addition, the tract De Eucharistia, which Luther had omitted for dogmatic reasons, and also an extended essay, De Causis Incarnationis et de Magnitudine Dominicæ Passionis, in two books; and three ascetical works entitled, respectively, De Oratione, Scala Meditationis, and Exempla Scelæ Meditationis. The impression made by a reading of the Farrago is that Wessel was a man who lived with pen in hand, and who for that very reason seldom undertook the composition of an extended work. It is, accordingly, not remarkable that statements with respect to lost writings from his pen do not harmonize. Wessel, Johann (2), a Dutch theologian, was born at Emden, Oct. 20, 1671. For some time he was preacher and professor at Rotterdam. In 1712 he was called as professor of theology to Leyden, where he died, Jan. 16, 1745. He is the author of, Dissertationes Sacrae Leid. ad Selecta quædam V. et N. T. Loca (Leyden, 1721):—Nestorianismus et Adoptianismus Redivivus Confutatus, s. de Christo Unico et Proprio Dei Filio, non Metaphorico, Liber Sing. in quo Nestorii Pelagianizantibus Veterumque Adoptianorum Sententia ex Veter. Wesseling, PETER, a German philologist, was born at Steinfurth, Jan. 7, 1692, of an old and wealthy Westphalian family celebrated in literary circles. He was educated at the University of Leyden, and afterwards at Franeker, where in 1718 he was received as a candidate for the ministry. In 1719 he was made pro-rector of the school at Middelburg, in 1721 rector of the gymnasium at Deventer, in 1723 professor of eloquence and history at Franeker, and in 1735 filled the same chair (with the addition of canon law in 1746, and the librarianship in 1749) at Utrecht, where he died, Nov. 9, 1764. He wrote, Epistola ad H. Venemam de Aquilæ in Scriptis Philonis Jud. Fragmentis et Platonis Epistola XIII (Utrecht, 1748):—Observationum Variarum Libri (Amst. 1727):—Diatribæ de Judæorum Archontibus ad Inscriptionem Berenicensem, et Dissertatio de Evangelii Jussu Imperatoris Anastasii non Emen-datis, etc. (Utrecht, 1738):—Dissertationes de Origine atque Usu Nummorum apud Hebræos (ibid. 1750):—Dissertationes in Epistolam Jeremiæ (ibid. 1752). Wessely, HARTWIG (or, according to his Jewish name, Heriz Wessel), a noted Jewish writer, was born in 1725 at Hamburg. Like his friend Moses Mendelssohn, he was originally a Rabbinic Jew, and observed the traditional law to the last. His thirst for knowledge led him to acquire the German, French, Danish, and Dutch languages, and to study mathematics, natural philosophy, geography, and history. An extraordinary power of writing Hebrew, both prose and poetry, secured him the esteem of his nation, and gave him an opportunity of communicating his acquirements in a national, and therefore an unsuspected, form. The edict of the emperor Joseph II to establish elementary schools among the Jews first exhibited Wessely as a Reformer. He wrote a letter to the congregation at Trieste upon the subject, in which he related the importance of elementary instruction, recommended the study of Hebrew grammar, and advised the postponing of the Talmudic studies to a ripper age. This brought down upon him all the weight of Rabbinic indignation, especially that of the Polish rabbins, who attacked and anathematized him with vehemence, while those of Trieste, Venice, Ferrara, and Reggio supported him. Wessely, who died at Hamburg in 1805, may be considered the founder of modern Hebrew literature, in the same way as Mendelssohn was of German literature among the Jews of his age and country. For though in destitute circumstances, he found time and strength to write a series of works which form a new era in Hebrew composition, and have united his name with that of Mendelssohn in the honorable appellation of the "two restorers of science among the Jews." Jost's description of the effects of their labors is very striking. He says, "They found the Jews without any language; they gave them two at once—the German and the Hebrew." He wrote, ירוח חן, The Spirit of Grace (Berlin, 1780, a. o.), a commentary to the Book of Wisdom, translated into Hebrew by himself:—באור לספר ויקרא, a commentary on Leviticus, which forms part of the commentary of Mendelssohn's Pentateuch:—יין לבנון, The Wine of Lebanon (ibid. 1775), a commentary on the treatise Aboth:—

is before him, קִדְמָה, strictly what is before or in front; the south on his right hand, יְמִינִי, strictly what lies to the right; the north on his left hand, שְׂמֹאל, the left side; and the west behind him, אַחֲרָי, literally the hinder side. The last Hebrew word, though never translated "west" in our version, means so: as in Isa. ix, 12, "the Philistines behind," opposed to the Syrians, קִדְמָה; Sept. ἀφ' ἡλίου δυσμῶν; Vulg. ab occidente; and in Job xxiii, 8. The words (Deut. xi, 24) "the uttermost sea," יָם הַיָּבֵשׁ הַזֶּה, are rendered in the Sept. ἡὸς τῆς θαλάσσης τῆς ἐπὶ δυσμῶν; Vulg. ad mare occidentale (comp. xxxiv, 2; Joel ii, 20). The more general use of the word אַחֲרָי for the west was doubtless superseded among the inhabitants of Palestine by יָם, literally "the sea," that is, the Mediterranean Sea, which lay to the west, and which, as a more palpable object, became to them the representative of the west generally, and chiefly associated with their ideas of it. Accordingly this word יָם and its derivatives, יָמָה, etc., are thirty-two times rendered by θάλασσα, in the Sept., and only once by δυσμαί; in the Vulg. by occidens and mare. It is used to signify a quarter of the heavens, or of the earth (Gen. xxviii, 14; Deut. xxxiii, 28; 1 Kings vii, 25; 1 Chron. ix, 24; 2 Chron. iv, 4; Isa. xi, 14; xlix, 12; Ezek. xlviii, 1; Hos. xi, 10; Zech. xiv, 4). It is used adjectively in the same sense: as, west border (Numb. xxxiv, 6; Josh. xv, 12; Ezek. xlv, 7); western (Numb. xxxiv, 6); west quarter (Josh. xviii, 14); west side (Exod. xxvii, 12; xxxviii, 12; Numb. ii, 18; xxxv, 5; Ezek. xlviii, 3-8, 23, 24); westward (Gen. xiii, 14; Numb. iii, 23; Deut. iii, 27; Ezek. xlviii, 18; Dan. viii, 4); west wind (Exod. x, 19). Those words of Moses, "Naphtali, possess thou the west and the south" (Deut. xxxiii, 23), seem to contradict the statement of Josephus, that this tribe possessed the east and the north in Upper Galilee (Ant. v, 1, 22); but Bochart interprets "the south," not with regard to the whole land of Canaan, but to the Danites, mentioned in ver. 22; and by "the west" he understands the lake of Tiberias, otherwise called the sea of Tiberias, or Galilee, or Gennesaret; for the portion of Naphtali extended from the south of the city called Dan or Laish to the sea of Tiberias, which was in this tribe. So all the Chaldee paraphrasts expound the word יָם, here translated west; Sept. θάλασσαν καὶ Αἶβα; Vulg. mare et meridiem (Hieroz. pt. i, lib. iii, c. 18). In some passages the word signifies the coasts of the Mediterranean Sea, and "the islands of the sea" denotes the western part of the world, or European nations. Thus, in regard to the future restoration of the Jews to their own land, it is said (Hos. xi, 10), "when the Lord shall roar, then the children shall tremble (that is, hasten; an allusion to the motion of a bird's wings in flying) from the west" (see ver. 11, and comp. Isa. xxiv, 14, 15, with xi, 11; xxiv, 14). In the account given of the removal of the plague of locusts from Egypt, we are told (Exod. x, 19), "the Lord turned a mighty strong west wind," רוּחַ קָדִים, ἀνεμὸν ἀπὸ θαλάσσης. Supposing that these were the very words of Moses, or a literal rendering of his words, it follows that the Egyptians made a similar reference to the Mediterranean, since Moses, an Egyptian, would no doubt use the language of his country in describing an event which occurred in it. If his words do not refer to the Mediterranean, they must refer to the far-distant Atlantic, which, however, according to Herodotus, was not known to the Egyptians till many ages afterwards. Moses also represents God as saying to Abram, in the land, "Lift up thine eyes and look northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward, רָקִיעַ (Gen. xiii, 14). The allusion to the sea in the latter passage may be accounted for upon the supposition that the very words of God to Abram had been preserved, and were inserted by Moses in his history. In two passages (Psa. cvii, 8; Isa. xlix, 12) יָם stands opposed to יָבֵשׁ, but ought still to be rendered "the west:" comp. Amos viii, 12; Deut. xxxiii, 23. The west is also indicated by the phrase מִבּוֹא הַשֶּׁמֶשׁ, Sept. ἀπὸ γῆς δυσμῶν; Vulg. de terra occasus solis. These words are translated "the west country" in Zech. viii, 7, literally, the country of the going-down of the sun, and are fully translated in Psa. l, 1; cxiii, 3; Mal. i, 11; comp. Deut. xi, 30; Josh. i, 4; xxxiii, 4. Another word by which the west is denoted is מַצְרֵיב, from צָרַב, to remove, pass away, disappear as the sun does; hence the quarter of the heavens, etc., where the sun sets, the west. The same idea is conveyed in the Greek word δυσμαί, from δύω. It occurs in 1 Chron. xii, 15; Psa. lxxv, 6; ciii, 12; cvii, 3; Isa. xliii, 5; xlv, 6; lix, 19; Sept. δυσμαί; Vulg. occidens: in Dan. viii, 5, Sept. Αἶψ; Vulg. occidens. It is used to denote the west quarter of the heavens or earth. In the Apocrypha and New Test. the word translated "west" invariably corresponds to δυσμαί (Jud. ii, 19; Matt. viii, 11; xxiv, 27; Luke xii, 54; xiii, 29; Rev. xxi, 13); Vulg. occidens, occasus. Our Lord's memorable words, "They shall come from the east and the west," etc. (Matt. viii, 11), to which Luke adds "and from the north and the south" (xiii, 29), signify all the regions of the world; as in classical writers also (Xenoph. Cyr. i, 1, 3). Grotius thinks that this passage refers to the promise to Jacob (Gen. xxviii, 14). In our Lord's prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans (Matt. xxiv, 27), "For as the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west, so also shall the coming of the son of man be," he is supposed to have intimated the precise direction in which the Roman army conducted the invasion. His reference to the cloud, τὴν νεφέλην, rising out of the west, as the precursor of a shower (comp. 1 Kings xviii, 43-46), still corresponds to the weather in Palestine. Volney says, "The west and south-west winds, which in Syria and Palestine prevail from November to February, are, to borrow an expression of the Arabs, 'the fathers of showers'" (Voyage en Syrie, i, 297; comp. Shaw, Travels, p. 329).—Kitto. Notable instances of such showers are those at the battle of Beththoron (Josh. x, 11), and Elijah's sacrifice on Mt. Carmel (1 Kings xviii, 44).

WEST IN EXORCISM. A person to be exorcised stood with his face towards or his hands stretched in the direction of the west, the region or symbol of darkness. See BOWING TOWARDS THE EAST.

West, Benjamin, an eminent American painter, was born at Springfield, Pa., Oct. 10, 1738. He early discovered the artistic genius, sketching a rude likeness of his baby sister at seven years of age, and at the age of eight combining parts of two pictures into an original design, which he produced in colors on canvas to the infinite delight of his friends. At nine years of age he was introduced into the studio of an artist in Philadelphia named Williams, who gave him encouragement and furnished him with books on painting, and young West returned home fully resolved to be a painter. His parents, although Friends (and that body of believers were not favorable to the art), encouraged him in his determination, believing that he was predestinated to be an artist. His first painting that attracted any considerable notice was the portrait of Mrs. Ross, a very beautiful lady, the wife of a lawyer of Lancaster. This effort gained him so many orders for portraits that he could scarcely meet them. About the same time a gunsmith named Henry commissioned him to paint a picture of the Death of Socrates. Being at a loss for a model for the slave who was to hand the cup of poison to the philosopher, the gunsmith brought him a half-naked negro, and the picture was finished. About this time Dr. Smith, provost of the college at Philadelphia, induced young West to enter upon a course of study in that institution which should fit him for the high station he was destined to fill. He remained here until he was eighteen, with the exception of a short time when he accompanied Major Sir Peter Halkert as a volunteer to search for the remains and bury the bones of the army which had been lost under General Braddock. On his return from this expedition, he was called to witness the death of his mother, after which he returned to Philadelphia and set up as a portrait-painter. When he had exhausted his patronage in Philadelphia, he removed to New York, where he met with still better success. In 1760 he was assisted by some wealthy merchant to go abroad for the improvement of his talents. At Rome he was patronized by Lord Grantham, whose portrait he painted, became the friend of Mengs, and, as the first American artist ever seen in Italy, attracted much attention. He pursued his studies in Italy for three years, during which he was greatly assisted by wealthy Americans. He painted his Cimon and Iphigenia, and Angelica and Medora, and was elected member of the academies of Florence, Bologna, and Parma. In 1763, visiting England on his way to America, he was induced to remain in London, and in 1765 married Eliza Shewell, an American lady, to whom he had been engaged before going to Europe. He painted for the archbishop of York a picture of Agrippina Landing with the Ashes of Germanicus, which attracted the attention of George III, who became his steady friend and patron for forty years, during which time he sketched or painted over four hundred pictures. His first painting for the king was the Departure of Regulus from Rome, and it was so entirely satisfactory that the artist was received by the king on terms of intimacy from that time onward. West was one of the founders of the Royal Academy in 1768, and succeeded Sir Joshua Reynolds as its president in 1792, but declined the honor of knighthood. His Death of General Wolfe, painted in the costume of the period against the advice of all the most distinguished painters, effected a revolution in historic art. For the king he painted a series of twenty-eight religious pictures for Windsor Castle. His best-known works are, Christ Healing the Sick:—Death on the Pale Horse:—and the Battle of La Hogue. He attempted many wonderful, and to most artists dangerous, subjects, such as, Moses Receiving the Law on Sinai:—Descent of the Holy Ghost on the Saviour in the Jordan:—Opening of the Seventh Seal:—St. Michael and his Angels Casting Out the Great Dragon:—The Mighty Angel with One Foot on the Sea and the Other on the Earth:—the Resurrection:—and others of like character. He died in London, March 11, 1820, and was buried with great pomp in St. Paul's Cathedral. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a. v.; Galt, The Life and Studies of Benjamin West (Lond. 1816-20); Cunningham, Lives of Eminent British Painters.

West, Elizabeth, a pious lady, the wife of a Scotch clergyman, was born in Edinburgh in 1672, married Mr. Brie, minister of Salum, Fifeshire, and died in 1735. She wrote Memoirs, or Spiritual Exercises Written with her own Hand (Edinb. 1807). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

West, Enoch G., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Clermont County, O., Nov. 25, 1825. He was the special object of the prayers of his pious parents from infancy, and the subject of deep religious impressions from childhood; experienced religion in his fourteenth year, was appointed class-leader at the age of eighteen, joined the Ohio Conference in 1848, and continued energetic and devoted until his death, which occurred at Urbana, O., May 8, 1865. Mr. West possessed a well-stored mind, was a man of deep and uniform piety, bold and firm in principle. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 163.

West, Francis, an English Wesleyan minister, began his work in 1793, labored twenty-seven years, and died July 3, 1820. The Minutes characterize him as "a plain, useful man." See Minutes of the Conference, 1820.

West, Francis L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Rush, N. Y., March 7, 1840. He removed with his parents to Michigan when quite young, experienced religion in his youth, was licensed to preach in 1859, and in 1861 joined the Detroit Conference, and in it served the Church until the fall of 1864, when he was drafted into United States service, and sent in the Twenty-third Michigan Infantry to Tennessee, where he was shot, while on duty, by guerillas, and died in Hospital No. 1 at Chattanooga the next morning, Jan. 5, 1865. Mr. West's qualities of mind and heart made him a young man of great promise. He was firm in purpose, of intense earnestness, conscientious, affable, devout. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 168.

West, John (1), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Charles City County, Va., April 20, 1768. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1784, was licensed to preach in 1787, entered the travelling connection in 1790, and was appointed to Greene Circuit, in Tennessee. In 1802 he was transferred from the Virginia to the Baltimore Conference, his connection with that body lasting until 1825, when, at its organization, he became a member of the Pittsburgh Conference. For fifty-seven years (forty-four of which he was effective) "Father West" labored in the itinerant ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church, "and in every station his onerous and important duties were discharged with a fidelity but seldom equalled and perhaps never surpassed." He died July 22, 1847. "Modesty, innocence, and punctuality were prominent traits in the character of Father West." His death was as triumphant as his life was serene. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, iv, 238.

West, John (2), a Welsh Congregational minister, was born in 1808. He studied privately for the ministry, was ordained, and for some years preached in several English counties with acceptance and success. In 1839 he was received by the Colonial Missionary Society, and was sent to Tasmania under its auspices. He not only did good work as a minister, but as a political leader he did much for Tasmania, and his stirring appeals were a strong element in the resistance that finally triumphed over the imperial government. In 1854 he became chief editor of the Sydney Morning Herald, and labored in this capacity until his death, Dec. 11, 1873. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1875, p. 373.

West, Jonathan Renshaw, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Jackson County, Ala., Aug. 31, 1806. He experienced religion in 1825, was licensed to exhort in 1827, and to preach in 1832, and in 1846 or 1847 joined the Missouri and Arkansas Conference. During the war, he was compelled to leave the South for personal safety. In 1864 he went to Kansas, where he preached until his death, June 15, 1874. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 23.

West, Nathaniel, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born in Ulster, Ireland, in 1794. He was educated under Drs. Chalmers and Turner; entered the ministry in the Independent Connection in Hull, England, in 1821; came to the United States in 1834, and was pastor of Presbyterian churches successively at Meadville, Pa.; Monroe, Mich.; North East, Pittsburgh, MacKeesport, Belmont, Hestonville, and Philadelphia, Pa., besides being engaged in various benevolent agencies. He was senior chaplain in the Satterlee United States Military Hospital, West Philadelphia, from May, 1862, until his death, Sept. 2, 1864. He published, The Ark of God the Safety of the Nation (1850):—Popery the Prop of European Despotisms (1852):—Babylon the Great (ibid.):—Right- and Left-hand Blessings of God, or a Cure for Covetousness (Phila. 1852, 18mo):—Complete Analysis of the Holy Bible, Containing the Whole of the New and Old Testaments, Collected and Arranged Systematically into Thirty Books; Based on the Work of the Learned Talbot (N. Y. 1853, royal 8vo; 7th ed. 1855, royal 8vo, 1035 pp.):—The Overturning of Tyrannical Governments (preached before and published at the request of Louis Kossuth when in the United States, and by his order and at his cost translated into Magyar):—Lecture on the Causes of the Ruin of Republican Liberty in the Ancient Roman Republic, etc. (Phila. 1861, 8vo):—History of the Satterlee U. S. Army Gen. Hospital (West Phila., Hospital press, 1863, 12mo, 30 pp.). "Dr. West was a man of marked peculiarities and abundant labors." See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 134. (J. L. S.)

West, Richard, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1671. He became a commoner in Merton College, Oxford, in 1688; was afterwards elected fellow of Magdalen College; became prebendary of Winchester in 1706; archdeacon of Berks in 1710; and died Dec. 2, 1716. He published some essays, sermons, and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

West, Robert Athow, an American writer, was born at Thetford, England, in 1809. He emigrated to the United States in 1843; was the official reporter of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1844, and published the debates; was editor of the Columbia Magazine (N. Y.) from 1846 to 1849; co-editor of the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser in 1845, and editor-in-chief in 1850. He was the author of, Sketches of Wesleyan Preachers (N. Y. 1848).—A Father's Letter to his Daughter (1865). He was also one of the compilers of the Hymn-book of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and contributed to its pages, besides writing poetry and prose for periodicals.

West, Samuel (1), D.D., an American Unitarian minister, was born at Yarmouth, Mass., March 3, 1730 (O. S.). He labored on the farm until he was twenty years of age; graduated at Harvard College in 1754; was ordained minister of a part of Dartmouth (now New Bedford and Fair Haven) June 3, 1761; was a zealous patriot during the American Revolution, encouraging the people in public addresses, entering the army as chaplain, and adding all the weight of his great learning to the American cause; withdrew from his ministerial labors in June, 1803; and died at the house of his son in Tiverton, R. I., Sept. 24, 1807. He was a man of extraordinary physical and mental powers, and was esteemed the most learned man of his time in New England. He was a vigorous preacher, and was noted for the complete mastery of his subject. He was the author of Essays on Liberty and Necessity (1798 and 1795, 2 pts.), and several single Sermons preached on various occasions. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 37 sq.

West, Samuel (2), D.D., an American Unitarian minister, was born at Martha's Vineyard, Nov. 19, 1738 (O. S.). He spent his early years at hard labor; entered Harvard College in his twentieth year, and graduated in 1761; became chaplain to the garrison of Fort Pownall at Penobscot, Me., November, 1761; returned home in 1762; spent some time in the study of divinity at Cambridge; was settled as pastor at Needham in 1764; became pastor at the Hollis Street Church, Boston, March 12, 1789; withdrew entirely from public labor in 1805; and died April 10, 1808. He was the author of a series of articles in the Boston Sentinel, over the signature of "The Old Man"; and several single Sermons. A Biographical Sketch has been published by the Rev. Thomas Thacher. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 50 sq.

West, Stephen, D.D., an eminent Congregational minister, was born in Tolland, Conn., Nov. 13, 1735. He graduated at Yale College in 1755; taught at Hatfield, Mass.; studied theology with Timothy Woodbridge; became chaplain at Hoosack Fort; and was ordained as successor of Jonathan Edwards in the Indian Mission at Stockbridge in 1759. In a few years he gave up the Indian portion of his charge, and confined himself to the increasing body of English. He was dismissed in August, 1818, and died May 15, 1819. Dr. West in appearance resembled a Puritan of the old school. He was most exact and uniform in his habits and work. His Christian character was one of strength, purity, simplicity and tenderness; his preaching was able, earnest, and eminently didactic—five hundred and four persons united with the Church during his pastorate. In theology, Dr. West was a Hopkinsian; in metaphysics, a Berkeleyan. He was a contributor to theological periodicals, and, besides several Sermons, the following are his publications:—An Essay on Moral Agency (1772; enlarged ed. 1794). Dr. Woodbridge calls this "one of the most extraordinary specimens of subtle metaphysical reasoning";—Duty and Obligation of Christians to Marry only in the Lord (1779):—An Essay on the Scripture Doctrine of the Atonement (1785): "less metaphysical and more popular than that on Moral Agency. It enjoys a high measure of favor with profound theologians";—An Inquiry into the Ground and Import of Infant Baptism (1794):—Dissertation on Infant Baptism; Reply to Rev. Cyprian Strong (1798):—Life of Rev. Samuel Hopkins, D.D. (1806):—Three Sermons on the Mosaic Account of the Creation (1809):—Evidence of the Divinity of Christ, collected from the Scriptures (1816). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 548–556; Cong. Quar. 1859, p. 41.

West, William (1), D.D., an American Episcopal clergyman, was born in Fairfax County, Va., near Mount Vernon, about 1739. He was ordained and licensed for Virginia by the bishop of London, Nov. 24, 1761; became rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster parish, Ann Arundel County, Md.; rector of St. Andrew's parish, St. Mary's County, Nov. 17, 1767; incumbent of St. George's parish, Harford County, in 1772; incumbent of St. Paul's parish, Baltimore County, June 7, 1779; was five years (1780–85) employed to officiate every third Sunday in St. Thomas's Parish Church; took a prominent part in the organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America after the Revolution; was chosen president of the Diocesan Convention in May, 1790; and died March 30, 1791. He was a Whig during the Revolution, and left no published works. He ordered his sermons to be burned, stating that they were not worthy of preservation. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 208 sq.

West, William (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Ireland. He was converted in early life; entered the itinerancy in 1779; was totally blind for many years; became a supernumerary in 1817; and died in Aberdeen, Scotland, Sept. 2, 1822, in the eightieth year of his age. West was a man of strict integrity, piety, and of no mean gifts. See Minutes of the Conference, 1823; Wesl. Meth. Magazine, Oct. 1822, p. 686.

Westall, Thomas, an early Methodist preacher, labored forty years in England; from 1740 until worn out. He retired to Bristol about 1780. He had some exciting experiences, one of which Atmore records. It was connected with Gwenap, famed in the history of early Methodism. He was at the Third Conference in 1746. He died in Bristol, April 20, 1794. He was a pattern of Christian simplicity and humble love. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.; Minutes of the Conference, 1794; Stevens, Hist. of Meth., i, 174, 315; iii, 89.

Westbrook, Cornelius D., D.D., an early and distinguished minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was a descendant of both Puritan and Huguenot stock. His father was a Revolutionary soldier; his mother died in his infancy. He was born at Rochester, Ulster Co., N. Y., in 1782; graduated at Union College in 1801; studied theology with Dr. Theodoric Romeyn, and was licensed in 1804 by the Classis of Albany. He was settled at Fishkill, N. Y., twenty-four years (1806–

30). Then for three years he was the first editor of the Christian Intelligencer, which had just been established as a weekly paper in place of the old Monthly, the "Magazine of the Reformed Dutch Church." After this he became rector of the grammar-school of Rutgers College in 1833; but returned to the pastorate in 1836 at Cortlandtown, N. Y., where he remained fourteen years (1836-50), and then retired from active service to Kingston, N. Y., where he died in 1858. Dr. Westbrook was in every respect a man sui generis. He was original in thought, speech, writing, and action. He stereotyped nothing—for he could never be anything but himself. He was learned and scholarly in his tastes, but could never endure rigid system, nor follow in the tracks of others. His mind was quick, intuitively springing to conclusions which others reached only by slow reasonings. His intellect and heart and will all acted impulsively, and often at a white heat. He studied topics, not treatises and systems. His preaching was moulded in the same way, by generous and noble impulses, by large views of truth, by intense and fervid conceptions, and by the genius which often shone in his illustrations and peculiar modes of expression, as well as by the piety which warmed his childlike heart. In prayer also he was himself, natural, trustful in God, reverential, and devout. At the grave of Washington among the veterans of the War of 1812, whose chaplain he was, he prayed so that no eye was dry in that assembly of gray-haired heroes. His social qualities were unique and attractive. He was a Nathanael in whom there was no guile, but he was also as cheerful and happy and exuberant as a boy. His heart never grew old. "He was always a boy." His pupils, parishioners, and friends loved him just because he was Dr. Westbrook, unlike any one else, and always genial, gentle, great-hearted, honest, simple-minded, single-eyed, and unselfish, full of sympathy for the weak and suffering, full of generosity and labors for the cause of Christ. His very frailties grew out of the simplicity of his large nature, and doubtless they added much to his experiences of the grace of God. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church, p. 264, 265. (W. J. R. T.)

Westbrooks, James M., a Southern Methodist Episcopal minister, was born March 10, 1827. He professed conversion in his twentieth year; began preaching in 1852; and in 1853 was received into the North Carolina Conference, wherein he labored faithfully until compelled to retire from active service by severe illness a short time previous to his death, which occurred Jan. 28, 1856. Mr. Westbrooks possessed a fervent but unobtrusive piety, and though smitten down in the morning of life, he left abundant evidence of his ability as a preacher, his diligence as a pastor, and his consistency as a Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1856, p. 694.

Westcott, Lorenzo, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Southern New Jersey, and belonged to a large connection known in that part of the state. He was a graduate of Princeton College and entered the Theological Seminary in 1852, where he remained three years and graduated. He was ordained in Green Avenue Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, L. I., and was installed pastor of the Church at Warrior Run, Pa., in 1859. He was called to a professorship in Lincoln University in 1865, and remained at that post until transferred to a professorship in Howard University. He was deeply interested in the education and elevation of the colored race in this country, and gave to this important matter his stores of learning and unceasing labors. He died at Germantown, June, 1879. See Presbyterian, June 14, 1879. (W. P. S.)

Westcott, William Augustus, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Orange County, N. Y., in 1814. After receiving an academical education, including the languages, he became a clerk in a mercantile house in New York city. While thus employed he united with the Church, and soon after turned his attention to the ministry; but not being able to bear the expense of an education, he studied medicine. He was, however, dissatisfied, feeling it his duty to preach. His way was opened to enter Princeton Seminary, which he did in 1841, and spent there two years in study. On April 17, 1845, he was licensed to preach, and for some time supplied the pulpit of the F Street Church, Washington, D. C., and afterwards that of the Church of Ramapo, N. Y. He was ordained an evangelist by the Hudson Presbytery, and was called to the Church at Florida, where he was installed pastor in 1849. Here he labored eleven years with marked success. At the dissolution of the pastorate he was called to the Church at Bloomingburg, where he was installed in 1868. After laboring here three years, he was called to the Centreville Church, and he remained here until he died, Feb. 23, 1876, beloved and regretted by all. (W. P. S.)

Westen, Thomas Or, a missionary among the Lapps or Finns down to the year 1727. This man was one of the most noteworthy characters in the history of Protestant missions. The people among whom he labored dwelt from latitude 64° northward, chiefly in the marshes of Finland and in the North country, but to some extent also among the Norwegians. Their number is now reduced to from 4000 to 7000 souls. They speak a language resembling that of the inhabitants of Finland, proving that they belong to the same stock. As they have not made any considerable advancement in civilization, they are greatly despised by Norwegians and Swedes. In the period of the Christianizing of those regions, they heard the Gospel and were forced to receive baptism. The preachers were not able to traverse all the country and reach all the people, and hiring adventurers, intent only upon the securing of gain, came to occupy many of the parishes. In many instances persons were denied the privileges of religion because too poor to pay the amounts demanded by their ministers as a yearly contribution. The Norwegians, too, were guilty of overbearing and unjust conduct in their intercourse with these people. The result was what might have been expected; the Finns returned to their former heathenism, though outwardly observant of the forms of Christian worship. Baptized children were washed on their return from Church in order that their baptism might not take effect on them, and a sort of counter-baptism was administered, etc. A Finnish name was given the child, which was carefully concealed from the preachers, etc. The forgiveness of the heathen gods was invoked whenever participation in the sacrament of the Lord's supper became necessary.

In morals, the use of alcoholic liquors had done great harm. Drinking-shops stood in church-yards and at church-doors, and even ministers of the Church carried on a profitable traffic in the business of providing for the general thirst for fiery potions, and used persuasion to induce unwilling persons to drink. In time, no ceremony could be conducted without the use of alcoholic drink. Marriages were sealed with it, and it was sprinkled over the graves of the dead as a sort of holy water. After a time, the Norwegians came into the possession of the Finnish lands and property, and even children.

The Danish-Norwegian Church was not, however, altogether unconcerned about the needs of this people. Bishop Eric Bredahl visited it repeatedly, and won a few individuals over to Christianity. Isaac Olsen, a schoolmaster, spent fourteen years at Varanger, on the Russian frontier, and under the 70th degree of latitude, engaged in apostolic toils, enduring apostolic sufferings for the cause of Christ, and succeeding so far as to see some of his pupils excel their Norwegian competitors in a knowledge of Christian doctrines in the annual visitation of churches and schools. In 1707, king Frederick IV of Denmark ordered an investigation of the condition of schools and churches in Nordland and Finmark, and in 1714 he ordered the newly founded Collegium de Promovendo Cursu Evangelii to make preparation for a mission among the Finns. The result of the measures taken in consequence of these orders was the selection of Thomas of Westen to be the superintendent of the proposed mission.

Westen was born at Trondhjem, in 1682, and was obliged in early life to contend with want and difficulties of every sort. His father refused to permit him to study, and, when benevolent effort made a university career possible, induced him to study medicine instead of theology. Just as he was about to take the degree of M.D., his father died and left him penniless; but poverty did not deter him from entering on the study of theology, and particularly of Oriental languages. He was able to get food of very inferior quality, and only on alternate days; and he shared with his room-mate in the ownership of an old and poor black coat, which compelled him to remain indoors when the garment was away. A call to Moscow as professor of languages and rhetoric, which was extended to him at this time by Peter the Great, was withdrawn without result, and he accepted instead the post of librarian at Trondhjem without salary, but with a prospect of ecclesiastical preferment. In 1710 he became pastor of the parish of Wedoen, and after six years of successful labor was made lector and notary of the Trondhjem chapter, and soon afterwards vicar and manager of missions among the Finns. In the capacity of lector he was called on to preach several sermons in each week, to deliver daily lectures on moral and positive theology, and also to guide the school, which was designed to become a nursery for the Finnish mission.

Westen's first missionary tour among the Finns was undertaken May 29, 1716, and was protracted through West Finmark, East Finmark, and Nordland until autumn, when he returned in open boats, often at the risk of being drowned in the stormy inland waters, to Trondhjem. He brought the worn-out Olsen with him, and afterwards recommended him for the post of Finnish teacher and interpreter in the missionary college. He had left a chaplain as missionary in East Finmark, and had appointed a number of itinerant teachers, besides encouraging the building of churches by all the natives whom he could persuade to that work. He also brought to Trondhjem a number of Finnish children to be trained for missionary work, and in time sustained a seminary for such children in his own house. The bishop, Krog, endeavored to prevent the success of Westen's plans, but was defeated through the favor of the king. In 1717 the seminary was securely established, and royal edicts were issued providing for the erection of churches and chapels within the field of the mission, and settling the relations and duties of catechists and teachers and similar matters. A second missionary tour was begun by Westen, in company with several assistants whom he had gained, in June, 1718. He was already permitted to note progress in the work he had so recently begun. Several churches were in course of erection, and a number of children were secured for instruction in the principles of Christianity. The volunteers who accompanied him were left as pastors in different places, and not only became useful laborers in the preaching of the Word, but also valuable contributors to the literature of the country. Erasmus Ræhlew translated Luther's Catechism, and wrote a Grammatica Lapponica, and a Specimen Vocabularii Lapponici. Martin Lund rendered similar service with his pen. Westen was unable to return to Trondhjem in the autumn of this year, and contented himself with rendering a written report, which led to his being summoned to Copenhagen in the following spring that he might give fuller information. He was presented to the king, and was permitted to submit for examination a list of whatever things he might consider necessary to the promotion of success in his work. Corresponding arrangements were then made and new missionaries enlisted.

On Westen's return for a third missionary tour, begun June 29, 1722, he found a great awakening among the young people of his charge. They clamored for education and read the Bible. The population of certain places which he had not previously visited were, however, bitterly hostile. At Siimen the people had threatened to take his life; but when he preached to them, they were subdued and won. On the rock Overhalden lived a population of 283 souls who never came into the valleys, and who had never been visited by a preacher of the Gospel. When they heard that Westen intended to visit them, they were seized with mortal terror, and held a magical mass to deter him; but he came and gained their good-will and submission to the Gospel. Similar experiences awaited him in Snaasen, where he remained two months, and, after his return to Trondhjem, in May, 1723, in Stordalen and Merager, in the immediate vicinity of that centre. He purposed visiting the Finns, also, who dwelt within the bounds of the diocese of Christiania, but was hindered by its bishop. In 1725 the district of Salten contained 1020 newly converted Christians, and that of Finmark 1725.

During these years Westen wrote many works in the interest of his mission, chiefly of a practical nature. A history of the Finnish-Lapp mission was completed, but has never been published, and is now probably lost. His last days were troubled with poverty. He died April 9, 1727, leaving behind him a widow who had been a helpmeet for him indeed, and continuing to live in the recollection of the people whom he had served as "the lector who loved the Finnish man." Westerås (or Vesterås), a town of Sweden, capital of the laen of Westmanland, sixty miles west-north-west of Stockholm. An imperial diet was held here in 1527, in which the Protestant controversy was brought to a crisis. Liberty was granted for the "preachers to proclaim the pure Word of God," a Protestant definition being coupled with this phrase. The property of the Church, with the authority to regulate ecclesiastical affairs, was delivered into the hands of the king. The Protestant churches retained their revenues, and the ecclesiastical property fell, for the most part, to the possession of the nobles. See Fisher, Hist. of the Reformation, p. 176.

Westergaard, NIELS LUDWIG, a Danish Orientalist, was born Oct. 27, 1815, at Copenhagen, where he also commenced his linguistic studies, which he continued from 1838 to 1839 at Bonn, Paris, London, and Oxford. From 1841 to 1844 he travelled through India and Persia, and after his return was appointed in the latter year professor of Indian philology at Copenhagen, where he died, Sept. 9, 1878. Of his writings we mention, Radices Linguae Sanscritae (Bonn, 1841). — Sanskrit Formlaere, together with Sanskrit Læsebog (Copenh. 1846). He also published the critical edition of the Zendvesta (ibid. 1854). — and the Bundehesh (ibid. 1851). His two treatises De aldste Tidrum i den indiske Historie and Buddhas Dødsaar (ibid. 1860) have been translated into German (Breslau, 1862). (B. P.)

Westerlo, EILARDUS, D.D., the successor of Theodorus Frelinghuysen in the Reformed Church of Albany, was born in Groningen, Holland, in 1738, his father, Rev. Isaac Westerlo, being pastor of the Church at that place. Consecrated by his parents from his early boyhood to the ministry, after spending six years at the Latin school of Oldenzaal he entered the University of Groningen at the age of sixteen; spent six full years in preparation for his holy office; and at twenty-two was admitted to its vows in 1760. Just at that time he unexpectedly received and accepted the call to Albany; was installed as pastor of the Church in March, and arrived in the autumn of that year in the city where he spent his ministerial life. About eight years after coming to Albany he fell into a state of religious despondency, which proved to be an eventful period of his spiritual life. Relief came only with much prayer and struggle of soul, but it seemed like "life from the dead." In 1775 he married the widow of Stephen Van Rensselaer, patron of the manor of Rensselaerwyck, and resided with her at the manor-house until 1784, when they removed to the parsonage on Broadway. Dr. John H. Livingston's wife was the sister of Mrs. Westerlo. The relationship between these two eminent clergymen grew in strength and usefulness with their years and services for Christ's kingdom. Both of them were ardent supporters of the independence of the American Church from that of Holland, and were known as peace-makers and leaders during all the strifes which ended in the triumph of their principles. Both of them were equally bold and influential patriots during the Revolutionary War. When Burgoyne was moving towards Albany in 1777, Dr. Westerlo took his family to a place of safety, but came back to his home, directed his church to be opened, and held daily religious services for a week, with fervent prayers for the army and animating exhortations to those who remained in the city. Dr. Livingston aided him in these patriotic services, which continued until the surrender of Burgoyne and his army. When Washington visited Albany in 1782, Dr. Westerlo delivered the address of public welcome. Until 1782 he preached only in the Dutch language, and at his death stated services in that tongue ceased in his church. But at the period named he began to preach on a part of each Sunday in English, and continued to do so with acceptance until Dr. Bassett became his colleague, in June, 1787, about three years before his own decease. He was a man of fine personal presence, mild and persuasive in manner, yet dignified and commanding. He was beloved by his own people, and a favorite in the community among all denominations of Christians. An excellent classical and theological scholar, he was familiar with the best learning of his times. He wrote well in Hebrew and Greek, and president Stiles of Yale College, with whom he corresponded, said that he wrote Latin with greater purity than any man he ever knew. He left a Hebrew and Greek lexicon, prepared apparently for publication, in his own neat manuscript. Among his papers was found an interesting autobiography, written in Dutch, up to May, 1782, and in English up to Dec. 4, 1790. This work, he says, was written "for his own edification and the remembrance of God's mercies." During his last illness, a brief period of despondency was followed by the most cheerful and happy serenity of soul. "His people came from all parts of the city to see him when he was near his end, and he left them with his blessing in such a solemn manner that it was thought he did as much good in his death as in his life." He will always be remembered among the great and good ministers of the Church of his fathers. He died Dec. 26, 1790. "So omnipresent was his religion, so engrossing his piety, that his habitual state of mind seemed to be 'one continued prayer,' and his life 'one unbroken offering of praise.'" See Rogers, Historical Discourse, p. 81, 82; Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church, p. 265, 266; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ix, 29-31. (W. J. R. T.)

Westermeier, Franz Bogislaus, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 22, 1773, at Flechtorf, near Brunswick. He studied at Helmstädt, and in 1799 he was called as pastor to Magdeburg. In 1810 he was made superintendent, and in 1812 member of consistory. In 1817 the Halle University conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity, and in 1825 the king of Prussia appointed him evangelical bishop. Three years later he was made general superintendent of the province of Saxony. He died March 1, 1831. He was one of the most excellent pulpit orators of the evangelical Church, and his Öffentliche Religionsvorträge (Magdeburg, 1800) will always be regarded as fine specimens of pulpit eloquence. Westervelt, Alfred L., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born about 1820, of pious parents. He received a careful religious training; experienced conversion in his nineteenth year; began preaching soon after, and subsequently joined the Ohio Conference; served three years as junior preacher and three as senior; and died of cholera, July 31, 1849. Mr. Westervelt was a man of deep piety and respectable talents. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1849, p. 388.

Westervelt, John P., a Reformed (Dutch) scholar, was born at Paramus, N. J., Nov. 7, 1816. He was a teacher in Lafayette Academy, Hackensack, in 1838, and afterwards in private seminaries in New York and vicinity until 1844. He then studied theology for one year under the Rev. Albert Amerman. After engaging in various pursuits, he joined the Presbytery of Albany in 1855, and removed to Princeton, N. J., where he gave much time to the study of languages and Biblical criticism. He was familiar with the ancient languages, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and spoke fluently the German, French, and Dutch. Especially was he skilled in the last, and held familiar intercourse with the theologians and poets of the Low Countries. He preached as fluently in the Dutch language as in his own. Bilderdijk, his favorite poet, he esteemed equal to any of our English poets. When Dr. Cohen Stuart came from Holland to attend the Evangelical Alliance, so great had the fame of Mr. Westervelt become as a Dutch scholar that Dr. Stuart visited Paterson, to which place Mr. Westervelt had moved in 1866, in order that he might see the renowned scholar. Dr. Stuart afterwards spoke of his "eminent attainments being equalled only by his modesty." By request of the doctor, Mr. Westervelt was made a member of the Leyden Society of Netherlandish Literature, June 16, 1876. Although Mr. Westervelt was in doctrine a Calvinist, yet he was one of the most catholic of men. Among his brethren his opinion of difficult passages of Scripture was considered sufficient authority. His piety was fervent and deep, his character pure and spotless, his faith trustful and strong; and in his last hours, when utterance was difficult, he declared Christ to be his satisfaction. He died Jan. 15, 1879. He published a Translation from the Dutch of Van der Palm's Life and Sermons (1865). He contributed to the Princeton Review articles on Van der Palm (1861), Bilderdijk (1862), Strauss, and Schleiermacher (1866); also articles to this Cyclopædia. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, p. 550.

Westervelt, Ralph, a (Dutch) Reformed minister, studied under his father-in-law, the Rev. S. Froeligh. He was licensed by the Classis and served at Paramus in 1801, at Rochester and Wawarsing from 1802 to 1807, at Clove in 1808, at Bethlehem and Coeymans until 1816, and at Wynantskill from 1816 to 1822, in which latter year he died. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, a. v.

Westervelt, Samuel D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Schralenburg, N. J., April 21, 1813. He was converted in his eighteenth year; educated in the New York University; studied theology privately; was licensed by the New York Classis; and ordained, October, 1839, as pastor of a church in King Street, N. Y., known as the True Reformed Dutch Church. In 1852 he transferred his ecclesiastical relation to the Second Presbytery of New York, and in 1853 was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Yorktown, where he continued to labor almost until the close of his life. He died Nov. 15, 1865. He was a good scholar, a clear and instructive preacher, and an acceptable writer. He published one of the best articles on dancing as a fashionable amusement that have ever appeared in print. It was quoted in all the religious journals, republished in London, and highly spoken of by the London press. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 215.

Westfall, Benjamin B., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Claverack, Columbia Co., N. Y., in 1798. His early life was spent on a farm. Religious convictions seized his mind when quite young. He graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1823, and at the New Brunswick (N. J.) Theological Seminary in 1826. He was licensed by the Classis of New Brunswick in 1826. He was missionary at Sand Beach, N. Y., in 1827-28. Then he was made pastor of Rochester, part of which time Clove was connected with it. In this field he labored from 1828 until 1838, during which time he saw, as the fruits of his labor, about three hundred souls brought into the Church. His last charge was Stone Arabia and Ephratah, where he toiled from 1838 until his death, in 1844. He was a man of fervent piety and deep and strong convictions. His sermons, breathing his own high convictions of truth, were addressed both to the consciences and understandings of his people. He lived only to save men. His death was caused by excessive labor in revival and other meetings for the benefit of the people. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, s. v.

Westfall, Simon V. B., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Rhinebeck, Dutchess Co., N. Y., in 1802. He graduated at Rutgers College in 1831, and at the New Brunswick Seminary in 1834. He was licensed by the Classis of Rensselaer in 1834. He was pastor of the Hyde Park Church, Dutchess Co., N. Y., from 1834 to 1837, and Union and Salem from 1837 to 1847. At this time he went as missionary to Illinois, and in that capacity he labored for about two years, from 1847 to 1848. In 1849 he undertook the trying task of building up an "eminent Dutch Church" in the young city of Pekin, Tazewell Co., Ill., where, with the exception of one year (1853), in which he labored at Vanderveer, Morgan Co., he ministered until 1856. His task was long and arduous, but fruitless. He left Pekin in 1856, and returned to his native East to spend his declining days. He had scarcely got settled in his new house and engaged to supply the Second Church of Rotterdam, when he was taken sick, and died, in 1856. During the short time he was sick, he repeatedly uttered the word "Ecstasy!" while visions of glory passed before his mind. He was a man of settled purpose, inflexible integrity, and of a modest and diffident spirit. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, s. v.

Westfield, Thomas, an English prelate, was born at Ely in 1573. He was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, and afterwards became a fellow; was assistant to Dr. Nicholas Felton, at St. Mary-le-Bow, London, and then presented to the same Church; afterwards presented to St. Bartholomew's, made archdeacon of St. Alban's, and finally made bishop of Bristol, on account of his piety and wisdom. He suffered under the Revolution, was ejected from his bishopric, and died June 25, 1644. He left no published works, but two volumes of his Sermons appeared after his death.

Westhoff, Elbert Wilhelm, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1801 at Dolberg. He studied at Münster and in the Collegium Germanicum at Rome, where he received holy orders in 1828, and where he was promoted as doctor of theology. In 1829 he was called to the Church at Stünninghausen, and in 1833 to Diestedde. In 1851 he was called to Cologne as regent of the clerical seminary, which position he occupied until 1868, when he retired on account of feeble health. He died May 6, 1871, in the Alexian Monastery at Neuss. He is the editor of the ascetical writings of Avancinus, Augustine, Bellicus, Gregory the Great, etc. He also published new editions of Ballerini's writings on the position of the popes to the general councils, on the primacy of the popes, and their infallibilitas in definiendis controversiis fidei. (B. P.)

Westlake, Burrows, a Methodist Episcopal minister, of whose birth and early history nothing definite can be learned, joined the Ohio Conference in 1814. The last nine years of his life and labors were in connection with the Indiana Conference. He died of epidemic erysipelas, April 17, 1845. Mr. Westlake possessed a strong, well-stored mind, and a tender, devout heart. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1845, p. 658.

Westlake, Charles, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Launceston, Cornwall. He was converted under the ministry of Henry Cheveston, entered the sacred work in 1831, and died suddenly of apoplexy, Nov. 18, 1858, aged fifty-three years. See Minutes of the Conference, 1859.

Westley. See WESLEY.

Westley, James R., an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted under a sermon preached at Kingsland Road, London, by Holloway. He was received by the Conference in 1846, and died at Kingston, Jamaica, Nov. 29, 1847, aged thirty years. He was diligent, studious, and unremitting in his pastoral duties. See Minutes of the Conference, 1848.

Westminster Abbey, the venerable pile around which the city itself (now included in London) originally sprang. (The following account is taken from the Globe Encyclopedia, s. v.) The foundation of the first Abbey on a spot formerly surrounded by the waters of the Thames and called Thorney Island is involved in mystery, but here was certainly one of the earliest Christian churches in England. Sebert, king of the East Saxons, who died in 616, is believed to have completed a sacred edifice dedicated to Peter, which was destroyed by the Danes. Edward the Confessor in its place built a structure of great splendor for his time, and endowed it with a charter of ample powers and privileges. Henry III pulled down a portion and enlarged the plan of this ancient Abbey, adding a chapel dedicated to the Virgin, and the incomparable Chapter-house. Henry VII built the magnificent chapel to the east of the Abbey which bears his name. After his reign the building fell into decay until renovated by Sir Christopher Wren, who designed the upper part of the two western towers. The restoration of the Chapter-house was undertaken by Sir Gilbert Scott in 1863. The Abbey is in the form of a Latin cross, its exterior length being 416 feet, or, including Henry VII's Chapel, 530 feet. Its interior length is 375 feet, and its greatest interior breadth 200 feet. The breadth of the nave and aisles is 75 feet, and their interior height, to which the Abbey owes much of its stately appearance, is 101 feet. The best view of the Abbey is from the west door between the towers. In the interior is a noble range of pillars terminating towards the east by a sort of semicircle enclosing the Chapel of Edward the Confessor. The fabric is lighted by a range of windows supported by galleries of double columns on the arches of the pillars, by an upper and under range of windows, and four capital windows, the whole of the lights being admirably arranged. Twenty-two windows are enriched with stained glass. The new choir, 155 feet by 35 feet, was executed in 1848. The fifty-two stalls exhibit a great variety of carving and tracery. The reredos, completed under the direction of Sir Gilbert Scott, is an elaborate and splendid work. The names of the various chapels, beginning from the south cross and passing round to the north cross, are in order as follows: (1) St. Benedict's; (2) St. Edmund's; (3) St. Nicholas's; (4) Henry VII's; (5) St. Paul's; (6) St. Edward the Confessor's; (7) St. John's; (8) Isip's Chapel, dedicated to John the Baptist; (9) St. John, St. Michael, and St. Andrew's. The Chapel of Henry VII is adorned without with sixteen Gothic towers, beautifully ornamented and jutting from the Abbey at different angles. Here is the magnificent tomb of that monarch and his queen. In the south transept is the well-known Poet's Corner. Every English sovereign since the Conquest has been crowned in Westminster Abbey, and the coronation-chairs and the coronation-stone of Scotland are in the Chapel of Edward the Confessor. Thirteen kings (George II being the last) and fourteen queens are buried in its precincts. Here also are the remains of Chaucer, Spenser, Ben Jonson, Dryden, Cowley, Addison, Congreve, Prior, Gay, Dr. Johnson, Garrick, Sheridan, Campbell, and Macaulay; of Handel, Blow, and Westminster Abbey.

Purcell; of Pitt, Fox, Wilberforce, Grattan, Canning, and Peel—a multitude of the illustrious departed. Palmerston, Charles Dickens, Lytton, and Livingstone are among the latest of the glorious company. There are also memorials to Shakespeare, Milton, Goldsmith, Thackeray, John and Charles Wesley, and many others whose remains lie elsewhere. Some of the monuments, such as that to John, Duke of Argyll, are very imposing. The Abbey fills a great place in the political and religious history of England. The Chapter-house was used for three centuries as the meeting-place of the House of Commons, and was thus the cradle of representative government, and the scene of the chief acts which laid the foundation of the civil and religious liberty of England. The Westminster Assembly of Divines sanctioned in the Abbey the Confession of Faith which is the recognised creed of the Presbyterian Church (1643–52), and the final alterations in the Book of Common Prayer were made by the bishops in the Jerusalem Chamber in 1662. Roman, Anglican, and Puritan theologians have in turn preached in these walls. In recent times, under the enlightened rule of Dean Stanley, the national character of the Abbey has been well maintained. Officially called the Collegiate Church of St. Peter, it is governed by the dean, a chapter and eight prebendaries, and other officers. See Neale and Brayley, History and Antiquities of Abbey Church of St. Peter, Westminster (Lond. 1818, 2 vols.); Stanley, Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey (ibid. 1876, 4to); Historical Description of Westminster Abbey (1878), printed for the Vergers.

Westminster (Assembly's) Annotations.

By this name is commonly designated a work bearing the title of Annotations upon all the Books of the Old and New Testaments, by the Assembly of Divines (Lond. 1651, 2 vols. fol.; 3d and best ed. 1657). It was the conjoint work of several eminent ministers, but was in no respect the product of the Westminster Assembly, except as it is executed in the spirit of their publications, and by persons some of whom had been members of it. The notes on the Pentateuch and on the four gospels are by Ley, subdean of Chester; those on Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther by Dr. Gouge; those on the Psalms by Meric Casaubon; on Proverbs by Francis Taylor; on Ecclesiastes by Dr. Reynolds; and on Solomon's Song by Smallwood. The Larger Prophets fell to the lot of the learned Gataker; the Smaller, in the first edition to Pemberton, in the second to bishop Richardson. The eccentric Dr. Featley undertook the Pauline epistles, but did not complete his work; and Downham and Reading were both employed on the work, though what they did has not been specified. The work is more than respectable; some parts, especially those intrusted to Gataker, are done with superior learning and ability; and the whole, though of various merit, does credit to the piety, scholarship, and judgment of the authors.

Westminster Assembly of DIVINES, a name given to the synod of divines called by Parliament in the reign of Charles I, for the purpose of settling the government, liturgy, and doctrine of the Church of England. The Westminster Synod or Assembly of Divines derived its name from the locality in London where it held its sessions, and owed its origin to the ecclesiastico-political conflict between the "Long Parliament" and king Charles I, which resulted in the decapitation of Charles, the protectorate of Cromwell, and the events consequent on those changes. This conflict was, in its religious aspects, a struggle of Puritanism or radical Protestantism against a semi-Romish Episcopal hierarchy and liturgy; in its political bearings, a contest for parliamentary privilege and popular freedom against the monarchical absolutism of the Stuarts. The final result of the struggle was a constitutional monarchy and a moderate episcopacy, with an Edict of Toleration in favor of Protestant Dissenters.

After some unsuccessful attempts to obtain the sanction of the king, a joint resolution of the houses of Parliament was passed, June 12, 1643, which convoked a synod "for settling the government and liturgy of the Church of England, and for vindicating and clearing of the doctrine of said Church from false aspersions and interpretations," and, furthermore, for bringing about a more perfect reformation in the Church than was obtained under Edward VI and Elizabeth, by which a closer union of sentiment with the Church of Scotland and the Reformed churches of the Continent might be secured. It was intended that it should include among its members adherents of all the chief parties among English-speaking Protestants, except the party of archbishop Laud, whose innovations and despotic tendencies had been one main cause of the troubles in Church and State. Parliament appointed to membership in this synod 121 clergymen taken from the various shires of England, ten members of the House of Lords, and twenty of the Commons. The General Synod of Scotland, Aug. 19, 1643, elected five clergymen and three lay elders as commissioners to the Westminster Synod. These, it will be seen, were simply a committee raised by Parliament and amenable to its authority. About twenty of the members originally summoned were clergymen of the Church of England, and several of them afterwards bishops; but few of the Episcopal members took their seats. The bishops of the English Church never ac-knowledgeed its claims, and the king forbade its sessions under extreme penalties, June 22, 1643; but it nevertheless became, if measured by the far-reaching consequences of its work, the most important synod held in the history of the Reformed faith. The synod convened July 1, 1643, in Westminster Abbey, in the presence of both houses of Parliament. On the opening of the Assembly sixty-nine of the clerical members were in attendance, and at different times ninety-six of them were present, though the usual attendance ranged between sixty and eighty. The great body of the members, both clerical and lay, were Presbyterians; ten or twelve were Independents or Congregationalists; and five or six styled themselves Erastians. Nearly or quite all were Calvinists. The purposes for which, according to the ordinance, the Assembly was convoked were, as above stated, to vindicate the doctrine of the Church of England, and to recommend such further reformation of her discipline, liturgy, and government as might "be agreeable to God's holy word, and most apt to procure and preserve the peace of the Church at home, and nearer agreement with the Church of Scotland and other Reformed churches abroad." But when the Parliament, feeling their need of Scottish aid, acceded to the Solemn League and Covenant, and urged the Scotch to send their deputies to the Assembly, its objects were extended: and, in order to carry out the covenanted uniformity, it was empowered to prepare a new confession of faith and catechism, as well as directories for public worship and Church government, which might be adopted by all the churches represented. It retained to the last, however, its advisory character. The Church of Scotland threw all its influence in favor of strict Calvinism and Presbyterianism. Before electing delegates to the Westminster Assembly, in compliance with the request of Parliament, it adopted, Aug. 17, 1643, the so-called Solemn League and Covenant [see COVENANT, SOLEMN LEAGUE AND], which bound the Scottish nation to the defence of the Reformed religion in Scotland, the furtherance of the Reformation in England and Ireland in doctrine, worship, Church organization, and discipline; the establishing of ecclesiastical and religious uniformity in the three realms; the extirpation of papacy and prelacy, of heresy and all ungodliness; and the support of all the rights of Parliament and of the rightful authority of the king. This document was immediately transmitted to Parliament, and thence to the Westminster Assembly, and was formally endorsed by each of those bodies, but was condemned by the king. The Assembly sought to gain the fraternal sympathies of the Reformed churches on the Continent also, and to that end addressed to them circular letters which drew forth more or less favorable responses, and which the king endeavored to neutralize by issuing a manifesto in Latin and English, in which he denied the intention charged upon him of re-establishing the papacy in his realm.

The opening sermon was preached by Dr. William Twisse, who had been chosen prolocutor, and immediately thereafter the Assembly was constituted in the Chapel of Henry VII. The meetings continued to be held in this chapel till after the arrival of the Scottish commissioners, and were chiefly occupied with the revision of the first fifteen of the "Articles." On Sept. 15 four Scottish ministers and two lay assessors were, by a warrant from the Parliament, admitted to seats in the Assembly, but without votes, as commissioners from the Church of Scotland. The Solemn League and Covenant, binding the ecclesiastical bodies of the two nations into a union, had been passed in Scotland, Aug. 17, was subsequently accepted by the Westminster Assembly, and ordered by the English Parliament to be printed, Sept. 21, and subscribed Sept. 25, when the House of Commons, with the Scottish commissioners and the Westminster Assembly, met in the Church of St. Margaret, Westminster. The House of Lords took the "Covenant" Oct. 15.

The manner of proceeding is thus described by Bailie, one of the Scotch commissioners: "We meet every day of the week but Saturday. . . . Ordinarily there will be present about threescore of their divines. These are divided into three committees; in one whereof every man is a member. No man is excluded who pleases to come to any of the three. Every committee, as the Parliament gives order in writing to take any purpose into consideration, takes a portion, and in their afternoon meeting prepares matters for the Assembly, sets down their mind in distinct propositions with texts of Scripture. After the prayer, Mr. Byfield, the scribe, reads the propositions and Scriptures, whereupon the Assembly debates in a most grave and orderly way. No man is called up to speak; but who stands up of his own accord, he speaks, so long as he will, without interruption. . . . They harangue long and learnedly. They study the questions well beforehand, and prepare their speeches, but withal the men are exceedingly prompt and well-spoken. I do marvel at the very accurate and extemporal replies that many of them usually make."

The question of Church government occasioned the most difficulty, and seemed for a time impossible to be settled. Many of the most learned divines who were entirely on the side of Parliament were yet in favor of what they termed primitive episcopacy, or the system in which the presbyters and their president governed the churches in common. Then there were the Scotch commissioners and the more radical Puritans who were at the opposite extreme; and, in order to reach a conclusion, these differences must be reconciled. It was accomplished after much discussion and long delay by the adoption of the Presbyterian form of government.

The subjects relating to the form of public worship and the statement of doctrines occasioned less difficulty. Early in 1644 each of these was assigned to a small committee for the preparation of materials, after which they were to be brought first before the larger committees and then before the Assembly. The Directory for Public Worship was prepared in 1644. The question of Church Government, so far as it referred to ordination, was submitted to Parliament April 20, 1644, and ratified by that body Oct. 2, the same year. This Directory was completed during the following year, but the printing of it was delayed till 1647. In 1645 to 1646 the Confession of Faith was elaborated, and finally put into the shape in which it is still printed in Scotland. The Larger Catechism was sent to the House of Commons Oct. 22, 1647; the Shorter Catechism, Nov. 25, the same year. In the autumn of 1648 both houses of Parliament ordered the printing and publishing of the Shorter Catechism, but the House of Lords was discontinued before it had acted on the Larger Catechism.

The other papers issued by the Assembly consisted only of admonitions to Parliament and the nation, controversial tracts, letters of foreign churches, etc. The last of the Scotch commissioners left the Assembly Nov. 9, 1647. On Feb. 22, 1649, after it had held 1163 sittings, lasting each from 9 o'clock A.M. to 2 P.M., the Parliament, by an ordinance, changed what remained of the Assembly into a committee for trying and examining ministers, and in this form it continued to hold weekly sittings until the dissolution of the "Long Parliament," April 20, 1653.

A monthly day of fasting and prayer was regularly held in union with the houses of Parliament. In this time it had framed and adopted a complete standard of doctrine, government, and worship for the Reformed churches of the three kingdoms. Its labors were approved by Parliament, and their results elevated into laws of the State, though with certain modifications in the disciplinary arrangements. A perfect execution of these decrees was, however, impossible, because a large number of the English people adhered to the Episcopal establishment and liturgy, and the great majority of Irishmen were of the Roman Catholic faith. Scotland alone gave them an unqualified obedience, which has been continued almost intact down to the present day. From Scotland the Westminster standards were transmitted, with unimportant modifications of statement, to the different Presbyterian bodies of North America. After completing its labors, the synod was perpetuated in the character of a board of examination and ordination until March 25, 1652, when the dissolution of Parliament by Cromwell ended its existence, without any formal adjournment having been had.

The official records of the Assembly are supposed to have been lost in the great fire of London in 1666, though it is said that Dr. McCrie, the younger, recovered a portion of them. Extensive private reports by members of the synod are yet extant, however, e. g. Lightfoot's Journal of the Proceedings of the Assembly of Divines (Lond. 1824), Robert Baillie's Letters, and three manuscript volumes of Goodwin's Notes. Clarendon's History of the Puritan Rebellion is biased and insufficient; but Neal's History of the Puritans, pt. iii, ch. ii-x, has a very full and, upon the whole, trustworthy report. See also Hetherington, History of the Westminster Assembly of Divines (Edinb. 1843; N. Y. 1856); History of the Westminster Assembly of Divines (Presb. Board of Publ., Phila. 1841); Minutes of the Sessions of the Westminster Assembly of Divines (Edinb. 1874); Gillespie (Works, vol. ii), Notes of the Proceedings of the Assembly of Divines (ibid. 1844); Fuller, Church History, and Worthies of England; Palmer, Nonconformists' Memorial; Price, History of Protestant Nonconformity; Hetherington, History of the Church of Scotland; Reid, History of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland; Stoughton, Ecclesiastical History of England; Rutherford, Letters; Hanbury, Historical Memorials of the Independents; Brook, Lives of the Puritans; Reed, Lives of the Westminster Divines; Smith, Lives of English and Scottish Divines; Wood, Athena Oxonienses; Marsden, Early and Later Puritans; McCrie, Annals of English Presbytery; Stanley, Memorials of Westminster Abbey; and Skeats, History of the Free Churches of England.

Westminster Catechism. These are two in number, the Larger Catechism being designed for use in public worship, the Shorter for the instruction of the young. They are probably, next to the Heidelberg Catechism, the most widely circulated of Reformed catechisms, and differ from it in being more decidedly Calvinistic, and more logical in arrangement and intelligible in statement. The substance of the questions is steadily repeated in the answers, and the use of the third person is maintained throughout. The Shorter Catechism is simply an abridgment of the Larger.

Westminster Confession of FAITH, that body of doctrines proposed by the Westminster Assembly, and adopted by Parliament in 1646 as the creed of the English Church, and now the doctrinal basis of almost all Presbyterian churches. A committee, consisting of about twenty-five members, was appointed by the Assembly "to prepare matter for a joint Confession of Faith" about Aug. 20, 1644. The matter was prepared, in part at least, by this committee, and the digesting of it into a formal draught was intrusted to a smaller committee on May 12, 1645. The debating of the separate articles began July 7, 1645, and on the following day a committee of three (afterwards increased to five) was appointed to "take care of the wording of the Confession" as the articles should be adopted in the Assembly. On July 16 the committee reported the heads of the Confession, and these were distributed to the three large committees to be elaborated and prepared for discussion. All were repeatedly read and debated in the most thorough manner possible in the Assembly. On Sept. 25, 1646, a part of the Confession was finally passed, and on Dec. 4 the remainder received the sanction of the Assembly, when the whole was presented to the Parliament. That body ordered the printing of six hundred copies for the use of members of Parliament and of the Assembly, and that Scripture proofs should be added to the Confession, which was accordingly done. In 1647 the Confession was approved by the Church of Scotland in the form in which it had passed the Assembly, and it was ratified afterwards by the Scotch Parliament. It was passed by the English Parliament in 1648, under the title of Articles of Christian Religion, but with certain changes. The basis of the Confession is doubtless those Calvinistic articles which are supposed to have been prepared by Usher, and in 1615 were adopted by the convocation of the Irish Church.

In the formation of this symbol the Assembly at first undertook to revise the Thirty-nine Articles of the Anglican Church, and proceeded with that work until fifteen articles had been revamped with elements of a more pronounced Calvinistic character and provided with Scripture proofs. The only important change made in this process was the omission of Article VIII, concerning the authority of the three œcumenical symbols. The intention of the synod was to ground every statement directly on Scripture as the only rule of faith, while the Church of England, under Edward VI and Elizabeth, conceded to Catholic tradition, if not in conflict with Scripture, a regulative authority. The Scottish commissioners, however, induced the Assembly to undertake the formation of an entirely new symbol.

In the order and titles of many of its chapters, as well as in the language of whole sections or subdivisions of chapters, and in many single phrases occurring throughout the Confession, the Westminster divines seem to have followed the articles adopted by the Irish convocation. They very seldom determined points which that body had left open. Their purpose was to express their views in such a way as to obviate objections and secure union rather than division. Hence they introduced nothing into the Confession which had not been taught in England, Ireland, and Scotland before.

The Confession, under the title of The Humble Advice of the Assembly of Divines, now by Authority of Parliament sitting at Westminster, concerning a Confession of Faith, etc., was printed in London in December, 1646, without proofs, and in May, 1647, with proofs, for the use of the houses of Parliament and the Assembly. A copy of this last edition was taken to Scotland by the commissioners, and from it three hundred copies were printed for the use of the General Assembly there. After being approved by that body, it was published in Scotland with the title of The Confession of Faith Agreed upon by the Assembly of Divines, etc., and while the House of Commons were still considering it, a London bookseller brought it out under the same title in 1648. In the same year it was, with the omission of parts of ch. xx and xxiv, and the whole of ch. xxx and xxxi, and with some minute verbal alterations, approved by the two houses, and published under the title Articles of Christian Religion, Approved and Passed by both Houses of Parliament after Advice had with the Assembly of Divines, etc. But, notwithstanding this legal sanction, the latter form is not common; and the Confession continues to be printed in Great Britain in the form in which it was drawn by the Assembly and approved by the Church of Scotland.

The Confession ranks as one of the best Calvinistic symbols. It is clear, incisive, compressed, and provided throughout with Scripture proofs. It treats in thirty-three chapters of all the important doctrines of Christianity, beginning with the Scriptures as the only rule of faith, and ending with the Last Judgment. It has almost entirely superseded the Confessio Scotica of 1560, and is in use among the Presbyterian churches of Great Britain and its colonies, as well as of orthodox Congregationalists and Independents. In America the Confession is received by all similar bodies, with the exception of Article III of ch. xxiii, which treats of the civil power, and is altered to conform to American conditions.

For the doctrines of the Confession and their exposition, see Cunningham, Historical Theology (1862);

Westminster Directory FOR THE PUBLIC WORSHIP OF GOD contains no formulas, but merely general directions for the guidance of the worship of the Church. Parliament substituted this Directory for the Anglican liturgy, but the latter was restored on the accession of Charles II, and Scotland alone retained the Westminster.

Westminster Form OF PRESBYTERIAL CHURCH GOVERNMENT AND OF ORDINATION OF MINISTERS. The members of the synod were at first inclined, as a general thing, to content themselves with restoring apostolical or primitive simplicity in the Episcopal Church; but, after the arrival of the Scottish commissioners and the adoption of the Solemn League and Covenant, the synod became predominantly Presbyterian in its views. The Presbyterian constitution was recognised as originating with Christ and being the only scriptural form of Church organization. Toleration was opposed, and uniformity was strenuously insisted on. Liberty of conscience was stigmatized as the outgrowth of blameworthy indifference and betrayal of the truth. In these tenets the majority was zealously opposed, however, by the Independents led by Dr. Thomas Goodwin, who insisted upon the divine right of each congregation to govern itself under the Word of God; and by the Erastians, who wished to relegate the power to punish ecclesiastical as well as civil offences altogether to the secular authorities, and, in general, advocated the subordination of the Church to the State as the only trustworthy means for doing away with spiritual tyranny and also of obviating all conflict between Church and State. The leaders of the Erastian party were the celebrated Orientalists and antiquarians Lightfoot and Selden, etc. When the Presbyterian party prevailed, the Independents and Erastians withdrew from the synod; but Parliament adopted the Scotch-Presbyterian constitution with an Erastian proviso, and with the declaration that it should be set aside if, after trial, its provisions should be found impracticable. The event proved that England was not ripe for such a Church organization. Independency and other forms of dissent conquered the Westminster Assembly and made an end of all its endeavors towards conformity.

Weston, David, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in North Middleborough, Mass., Jan. 26, 1836, and was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1859, and of the Newton Theological Institution in the class of 1862. Soon after graduating he was ordained pastor of the Pleasant Street Baptist Church, Worcester, Mass., where he remained nearly eight years. He resigned on account of his health, and for two years was the principal of the Worcester Academy. For a short time he was pastor of the Central Baptist Church in Salem, Mass., from which place he removed to Hamilton, N. Y., having accepted an appointment as professor in Madison University. His instruction was in ecclesiastical history in the theological department, and civil history in the collegiate department. After a service of two years and a half, he died, Feb. 21, 1875. Dr. Weston published a revised and valuable edition of Backus's History of the Baptists in New England. (J. C. S.)

Weston, Edward, D.D., an eminent Roman Catholic divine, was born in London about the middle of the 16th century. He spent about five years at Oxford, studying in Lincoln College and in the private school of Dr. John Chase; studied subsequently six years at Rome and some time at Rheims; taught divinity at the latter place and at Douay from 1592 until about 1602; afterwards went on a mission to England, where he remained some time; returned to Douay in 1612; became canon of the collegiate Church of St. Mary at Bruges, in Flanders, in which capacity he continued until his death, in 1634. He was the author of several works, among which are, Institutiones de Triplici Hominis Officio, ex Notione ipsius Naturali, Morali, ac Theologica (1602);—Triall of Christian Truth by the Rules of the Vertues (Douay, 1614);—and Theatrum Vitæ Civilis ac Sacræ, etc. (1626).

Weston, Hugo, an English divine of the 16th century, was a native of Lincolnshire. He was educated at Balliol College, Oxford; became proctor of Oxford in 1537, was rector of Lincoln College in 1537–38, elected Margaret professor of divinity in 1540, became rector of St. Botolph's in 1543, archdeacon of Cornwall in 1547, dean of Westminster in 1553, archdeacon of Colchester in the same year, dean of Windsor in 1556, was deprived of his preferments by cardinal Pole for alleged immorality in 1557, and died in 1558. He was the author of, Oratio coram Patribus et Clero, Anno Primo Mariæ (1558);—Disputations with Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer in the Divinity School, Oxford (1554). See Alibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Weston, John Equality, a Baptist minister, was born in Amherst, N. H., Oct. 13, 1796. He was licensed to preach in 1822, and in 1827 was ordained pastor of the Baptist Church in East Cambridge, a relation which continued until his death, July 2, 1831. In 1819, in connection with Mr. True, he started the first Baptist newspaper in America, the Christian Watchman. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 713.

Weston, John W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Easton, Md., Jan. 1, 1839. He was converted in 1856; soon began preaching, and in 1862 was received into the Philadelphia Conference, and in it worked with great zeal and fidelity. He died in Wilmington, Del., April 23, 1877. Mr. Weston was a good preacher, a skilful workman, and an upright man. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 22.

Weston, Stephen (1), an English prelate, was born at Farnborough, Berkshire, in 1665. He was educated at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1686; became a fellow of both colleges; was for some time assistant and then under-master of Eton School; became vicar of Maple-Durham, Oxfordshire; was collated to a stall in Ely in 1715; became archdeacon of Cornwall; was consecrated bishop of Exeter Dec. 28, 1724; and died Jan. 16, 1741 or 1742. In 1749 two volumes of his Sermons appeared, published by bishop Sherlock.

Weston, Stephen (2), an English clergyman and Oriental scholar, was born at Exeter in 1747. He was educated at Eton and at Exeter College, Oxford; became fellow of his college, took orders in the Church of England, held the living of Mamhead (1777–90), that of Hempston, Devonshire (1786–90), and afterwards devoted himself to Continental travel and literature, becoming distinguished as a classical and Oriental scholar. He died in London, Jan. 8, 1830. His published works include translations from the Chinese and Persian, Specimen of the Conformity of the European with the Oriental Languages (1802);—Fragments of Oriental Literature (1807);—Sunday Lessons throughout the Year (1808–9);—Specimen of a Chinese Dictionary (1812);—Annotations on Certain Passages in the Psalms, with Hebrew and Greek Titles (1824);—besides several works on travel. See (Lond.) Gentleman's Magazine, 1830, i, 370.

Weston, William, an English clergyman, was born about 1700. He graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow, and was many years rector of Campden, Gloucestershire, where he died in 1760. He was the author of, Inquiry into the Rejection of the Christian Miracles by the Heathen (1746);—Dissertations on Some of the Most Remarkable Wonders of Antiquity (1748);—Safety and Perpetuity of the British State (1759);—New Dialogues of the Dead (1762);—and other works.

Westphal, Georg Christian Erhard, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1757 at Quedlinburg. He studied at Jena and Halle. After completing his studies, he acted for some time as private tutor. In 1775 he was appointed teacher at the Quedlinburg gymnasium, and in 1779 was called as second pastor to Halberstadt. In 1785 he went to Halle, was made member of consistory in 1805, and died Dec. 2, 1808. Besides a number of Sermons which he published, he translated the histories of Livy and Valerius Maximus into German. See Döring, Die deutschen Kanzelredner, p. 566 sq. (B. P.)

Westphal, Joachim, a zealous and uncompromising Lutheran polemic and Flacianist, was born at Hamburg in 1510 or 1511. He was educated at Wittenberg under Luther and Melancthon, and elsewhere, and after various vicissitudes settled, in 1541, as pastor in his native city. When the disputes consequent on the Leipzig Interim broke out, he united with Flacius and his party, and published his first work, against Melancthon and Wittenberg, under the title Hist. Vitulæ Aurei Aaronis Exod. xxxii, ad Nostra Tempora et Contror. Accommodata (Magdeb. 1549). A second work incident to the Adiphoristic controversy, and discussing the advisability of allowing the adiphora as a lesser evil than rejecting them, issued from his pen in the following year, entitled Explicatio Generalis Sententia quod e duobus Malis Minus Eligendum sit, ex qua Quivis Eruditus Intelligere Potest quod in Contror. de Adiph. Sequendum aut Fugendum sit. In the Osiandrian disputes he was associated with Johann Aepin in the judgment returned by Hamburg, etc., theologians to duke Albert of Prussia on Osiander's doctrine of justification (Magdeb. 1553). It is also probable that in the Majoristic controversy he composed the harsh opinion of the Hamburg theologians respecting Major's doctrine of the necessity of good works to salvation. His principal field of battle, however, was the sacramental dispute, in which he defended extreme Lutheran orthodoxy against Swiss and Philippist latitudinarianism. Peter Martyr had denied the bodily presence of Christ in the elements of the Lord's supper, at Oxford, 1549, and Calvin and Farel avowed similar views in the Consensus Tigurensis of that year, issued by them in conjunction with the clergy of Zurich. An extract from Martyr's lectures was soon afterwards published (Tiguri, 1552) by J. Wolphius, in which the editor claimed that Luther's doctrine of the Lord's supper had been thoroughly destroyed. Westphal at once issued in reply, and also as an attack upon the Philippists, who agreed more nearly with the Swiss than the Lutheran view, a Farrago . . . Opinionum de Cena Domini, etc. (Magdeb. 1552). In 1553 he repeated the effort by publishing Recta Fides de Cena Domini ex Verbis Apostoli Pauli et Evangel. (ibid.). At this juncture Mary of England had expelled the congregation of French and Netherlandish exiles formed by John à Lasco in London, and they were seeking a refuge in North Germany, which was everywhere denied them. Westphal held a disputation with Micronius, one of their preachers, and was exceedingly zealous in opposing them. In 1554 he published a third book against the Reformed doctrines of the sacrament under the title Collectanea Sentent. D. Aurel. Augustin. de Cena Domini, etc., in which he tried to show that the Swiss view has no support in the utterances of Augustine. This work, reinforced by indignation growing out of the author's treatment of à Lasco and his Reformed adherents, drew out a reply from Calvin, under date of Nov. 28, 1554 (Defensio Sana et Orthodoxa Doctr. de Sacrament., etc.), which was written in a style of proud and haughty depreciation of the adversary it was designed to demolish. A rapid interchange of writings followed, in the course of which Lasco, Bullinger, and Beza became involved in the dispute. As a final effort to defeat his opponents, Westphal wrote to various churches in Lower Saxony to unite them in a league against the Switzers, and received from many of them statements of their belief, which he published under the title Confessio Fidei de Eucharistia Sacramento, etc. (Magdeb. 1557). The leaders of the strict Lutheran party, e. g. Brentius, Andreä, Schnepf, Paul von Eitzen, etc., also came to his support. After 1560 Westphal withdrew from the arena of religious controversy. He acted as superintendent of Hamburg from 1562 to 1571, and in the latter year was appointed to that office. He died Jan. 16, 1574. See the Corpus Reformatorum (ibid. 1840-42), ed. Bretschneider, vol. vii, viii, ix; Gieseler, Kirchengesch. (Bonn, 1853), iii, 2, 1; Moller, Flensburg. Cimbria Literata (Hanau, 1744), p. 641-649; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Westphalia, PEACE OF (also known as the Peace of Münster). This title designates the treaty which brought the Thirty Years' War (q. v.) to a conclusion in 1648, and which was drawn up in the Westphalian cities of Münster and Osnaburg. The Peace of Prague, May 20 (30), 1635, concluded between the emperor Ferdinand II and the elector John George of Saxony, was designed to extend amnesty to Protestants over the whole empire, excepting Bohemia, the Palatinate, and various individual princes and nobles (see the imperial patent of June 12, 1635); but these exceptions, and the successes of the Swedish armies, together with the direct intervention of France in the war, prevented the consummation of the proposed peace, and constrained the emperor to convoke a general diet to meet at Ratisbon in 1640. A more important congress of deputies from the different contending powers was assembled, however, at about the same time in Hamburg, whose deliberations resulted in the signing of preliminaries of peace, Dec. 15 (25), 1641. The settling of these preliminaries was rendered difficult by the conflicting views of the French and Swedes, and the suspicions they entertained respecting each other; and the preliminaries themselves merely designated the places and dates for the holding of a definite peace convention, and determined rules to be observed with respect to the safe-conduct and powers of deputies. The sanction of the representatives of the empire and of the emperor himself to these arrangements was not obtained until 1644, and the proposed congress was delayed until April, 1645. The representatives of the emperor, the states of the empire, and the Swedes met at Osnaburg, and those of the emperor, the French, and other foreign powers at Münster. Each convention was to become a party to whatever decisions might be reached in either place, and neither convention was authorized to conclude a separate peace. The negotiations, which were protracted during more than three years, were greatly influenced, of course, by the varying fortunes of the war, which was incessantly prosecuted; but the Osnaburg convention succeeded in settling terms of peace, Aug. 8, and the Münster convention reached a like conclusion, Sept. 17, 1648. The treaty was then adopted and signed in a general assembly of both conventions, Oct. 14 (24), 1648. Spain and the United Netherlands had previously (Jan. 20 [30], 1648) reached an agreement at Münster by which the independence of the latter country was recognised and its league with Germany dissolved. The independence of the Swiss Confederation, already pronounced by the Peace of Basle, Sept. 22, 1499, was confirmed by the Treaty of Westphalia.

The provisions of this peace belong to our field only in so far as they involve religious or ecclesiastical interests. In these respects they

1. Ordain that the demands of France, Sweden, and Hesse-Cassel be satisfied. This confirmed the supremacy of France over the cities of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and established it over Alsace and the principality of Hagenau. Sweden obtained jurisdiction over Pomerania and the archbishopric of Bremen. These arrangements involved a transfer of ecclesiastical power also, though with certain exceptions which were particularly specified.

2. Compensate Brandenburg, Mecklenburg, and Brunswick-Lüneburg for territory lost by the arrangement made to satisfy France, etc., and thereby bring about similar ecclesiastical changes as are above described.

3. Declare a general amnesty and restitution of ecclesiastical property. The year 1613 was agreed upon as the year to whose conditions a return should be made; but in the application of this rule important exceptions were made, by which the Roman Catholic party was benefited. A majority of the electors was secured to this party; a portion of the Palatinate was transferred to Bavaria in the same interest; and a somewhat similar disposition was made of Baden-Durlach. In the hereditary states of Austria the amnesty was practically deprived of all effect by the numerous clauses and provisos with which it was hampered. Würtemberg, on the other hand, secured the return of all Church property of which it had been deprived as a Protestant state. Mecklenburg also, and a number of estates which had been excepted from the amnesty of Prague, were benefited by the Treaty of Westphalia. A special provision ordered that the ecclesiastical status of all adherents to the Augsburg Confession should be conformed to the conditions of 1624.

4. Arrange for the removal of occasions for dispute between churches. To this end the treaty of Passau (1552) and the religious peace of Augsburg were ratified, adherents to the Reformed confessions were accorded equal recognition with Lutherans and Roman Catholics, and the rights of Protestants and Roman Catholics were placed upon an equal footing; the right to the possession of church property was accorded to the party which held such property on Jan. 1, 1624; the traditional right of reformation within their own territories claimed by rulers was regulated, and also the status of persons who belonged to one Church while the government under which they lived adhered to another faith; and the limits of ecclesiastical jurisdiction were particularly defined.

5. Do away with political abuses growing out of the preference previously accorded the Roman Catholic over the Protestant Church. The according of territorial sovereignty to the different rulers impaired the summum imperium previously ascribed to the emperor, especially as similar rights and privileges were bestowed on the cities, etc., of the empire ("communitatibus et pagis immediatis").

6. Take measures for the execution of the treaty and the preservation of the peace.

The emperor issued edicts designed to give effect to the treaty Nov. 7, 1648, and the parties to the treaty exchanged the documents involved in its consummation Feb. 8, 1649. The leaders of the respective armies also had, since the close of 1648, conducted negotiations at Prague looking towards a realization of the peace, and this led to a congress at Nuremberg at which the three estates of the empire (electors, princes, and cities) were represented, and which passed, June 16, 1650, a general recess of execution. The papal legate, cardinal Fabius Chigi, had protested against the peace, Oct. 14 and 26, and Innocent X followed with the bull Zelo Domus Dei of Nov. 26, 1648. It is asserted that these protests were only designed to perform a duty which the pope owed to his position and his conscience, since they could under no circumstances exercise authoritative influence over the execution of the peace. The treaty was confirmed by the diet of 1654 and often afterwards. Its execution was, as respects particulars, secured only through many disputes, and its provisions have often been violated; but it has preserved its authority in general down to the present day.

Wetenhall (or Wettenhall), EDWARD, an English clergyman, was born at Lichfield in 1636. He was educated at Cambridge and Oxford; became rector of Lincoln College, Oxford; minister of Longcombe; canon residentiary of Exeter in 1667; removed to Ireland in 1672; became bishop of Cork and Ross in 1678; was translated to Kilmore in 1699; and died in London in 1713. He published, Method and Order for Private Devotion (1666);—Scripture Authentic and Faith Certain:—View of Our Lord's Passion (1710);—and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Wetherell, WILLIAM, an English clergyman, was born in 1600, and became minister at Scituate in 1640, in which capacity he continued until his death in 1684.

Wetherill, SAMUEL, a preacher of the Society of Free Quakers, was born at Burlington, N. J., in 1713, and removed to Philadelphia in early youth, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was a prominent manufacturer of that city as well as a preacher. He wrote, An Apology for the Religious Society called Free Quakers:—a tract on the Divinity of Christ:—and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Wetmore, IZRAHIAH, an American clergyman, was born in 1729. He graduated at Yale College in 1748; became minister at Huntington, Conn.; and died in 1798. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Wetmore, JAMES, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was graduated from Yale College in 1714. He was ordained the first Congregational minister in North Haven, Conn., in November, 1718, but in September, 1722, declared in favor of the Church of England. He immediately went to England, obtained orders, and returned in 1723 as catechist and assistant to the Rev. William Vesey of New York. In 1726 he became rector of the Church at Rye, N. Y., where he continued until his death, May 15, 1760. He published Quakerism a Judicial Infatuation, and other controversial works. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 16.

Wette, WILHELM MARTIN LEBERECHE DE, an eminent German theologian and critic, was born Jan. 12, 1780, at Ulla, near Weimar, where his father, Joh. Augustin, was pastor. He began his pursuit of learning at a time when German literature was in its highest glory, and in a region where its foremost representatives sojourned. In the school at Buttstädt he was greatly embarrassed by lack of money. Thence he went to the gymnasium at Weimar, where Böttiger was rector and Herder ephorus. His theological course was taken at Jena, where Griesbach, and still more Paulus, exercised a stimulating influence over him, and developed in him a taste for independent study of the Scriptures.

De Wette's earliest essay in literature was a critical dissertation on the book of Deuteronomy (Jena, 1805), and his next, Contributions to New-Test. Introduction (Beiträge zur Einleitung in das N. T.). In these works De Wette abandoned the attempt to explain the miracles of Scripture as natural occurrences, and took the ground that they are mythical events. To establish this position he undertook to show that the historical books of the Bible are of much more recent origin than ecclesiastical tradition teaches; that especially the Pentateuch is composed of fragments, the earliest of which originated in the time of David, and the latest, the book of Deuteronomy itself, in the reign of Josiah; and that many persons were engaged in the compilation of these books. As J. S. Vater, of Halle, had just published similar opinions, De Wette was obliged to revise his book and delay its publication until 1806, when the first volume of Beiträge in's Alte Test. appeared. The second volume appeared in 1807, and was remarkable for its development of the theory that the Chronicles are not drawn from the same source in which the books of Samuel and Kings originate; but that the writer of the Chronicles had made use of Samuel and Kings so far as they could serve his purpose, and had arbitrarily altered and made additions to them in the interests of the Levitical hierarchy; and for the manner in which these conclusions are made to react upon the credibility of the Pentateuch. He nevertheless persisted in maintaining the sacredness of the Scripture histories, even in their mythical form, and insisted that no miserable pragmatism should be allowed to destroy their sacredness. He declared truth to be the great law of history, and the love of truth to be the historian's first qualification; but truth was for him an ideal, poetic abstraction, which had no place either in the rationalism or the supernaturalism of those days. His views upon this subject are given in the article Beiträge zur Charakteristik des Hebraismus, in the Studien which he edited in common with Creuzer and Daub (1807). He places himself on the side of those who believe in revealed religion, and regards Christ as the true Redeemer and the central fact in revelation.

In 1807 De Wette became professor of theology at Heidelberg after having served as tutor at Jena, and having received the doctorate of philosophy. In 1811 he published a commentary on the book of Psalms (editions in 1823, 1829, and 1836), in which he denied the Davidic authorship of a number of psalms previously ascribed to David; applied the references made in certain psalms, by the current exegesis, to the person of Christ to less distant historical events; and assigned a later date than was usually assumed to the Psalms generally. He was himself constrained to feel that his work was not conducive to devotional effects, and subsequently modified many of its statements, besides writing a supplement on the devotional exposition of Psalms (Heidelb. 1837). He demands a strictly scientific exposition, and emphatically denounces all "play of pious ingenuity." Christ is, in his view, not foretold as a historical personage in the Psalms, though many ideal descriptions are there furnished which may be utilized for Christological purposes. In 1810 he was called to the then newly founded University of Berlin, where Schleiermacher became his colleague and his collaborer in the endeavor to secure a theology which might satisfy the demands of both faith and science, though they differed widely as respects the application of methods. Schleiermacher insisted on a strict separation of philosophy from theology, yet persistently made use of philosophy; De Wette, on the other hand, proceeded from the theistic standpoint of Kant's criticism, and also coincided with Jacobi in his theory of the feelings in religion. In methodology he wholly followed the philosophy of Fries. Knowledge and faith are by him sharply distinguished from each other—the former being a matter of the understanding, and being concerned with finite things only. Infinite things are to be apprehended by faith acting under the form of feeling (devotion, enthusiasm, resignation). The religious consciousness is accordingly æsthetical in character. The infinite is symbolically manifested in the finite, and the historical revelation must be conceived of, in consequence, as a symbol. This he held to be true of miracles also.

De Wette's critical labors, in this period of his life, extended beyond the limits of exegesis and reached over into systematic theology. In 1817 he published the Lehrbuch der hist.-krit. Einleitung in die kanon. u. apokryph. Bücher des Alten Test., which may be regarded as the consummation of his critical progress. It passed through seven editions, and was rated by De Wette as the most finished of the productions of his pen. In 1826 the complementary Einleitung in das Neue Test. appeared (6th ed. 1860). Earlier than both of these Introductions was his Lehrbuch der hebr.-jüd. Archäologie, etc. (Leips. 1814, 1830, 1842); and earlier still the Commentatio de Morte Jesu Christi Expiatoria (1813). In this, his first book in doctrinal theology, he assailed the orthodox view of the atonement from a new direction. He represented the death of Jesus as the unavoidable consequence of his moral action, and as unexpected, but grandly met when it was at hand. The philosophical principles on which De Wette's theological system was built are developed best of all in his little work Ueber Religion u. Theologie, etc. (Berlin, 1815 and 1821). The first part of his book on Christian doctrine appeared in 1813, and was devoted to Bible doctrines and pervaded by the principle of "historical development." In 1816 he published part ii, on ecclesiastical doctrines. In Bible doctrine he distinguished between Hebraism and Judaism in the Old Test., and the teaching of Jesus and the teaching of the apostles in the New. Church doctrine was not, to his thinking, a finished product, which could undergo no alteration and be developed no further; he saw in it simply a bond of union which binds together those who are members of the Church, but which deserves the attention of the theologian despite every advance that may be made. The presentation of Church doctrine, however, in these books, was simply that of the Lutheran Church. The author's own system was not given to the public until 1846. In 1819 the Lehrbuch der Dogmatik was followed by a Christliche Sittenlehre (Christian Ethics) in two parts, the former of which contained the system of ethics, and the latter the history of ethics. In this book De Wette turned aside from the beaten track, in that he did not regard Christian ethics as a mere aggregation of moral prescriptions, but as a life having its root in a Christian disposition of the heart. His views in this field are still further exhibited in the article Kritische Uebersicht der Ausbildung der theolog. Sittenlehre in der evangel.-luth. Kirche seit Calixtus, in the Theolog. Zeitschrift of 1819 and 1820 (edited by himself, Schleiermacher, and Lücke). His published views upon this subject fairly reflected his own theological character. He combined in himself most intimately the scientific and the practical ethical character. His whole being was enlisted in the endeavor to work a moral renovation of the German people, and a restoration, on a large scale, of a Christian community in the land. Unable to use the pulpit, he drew up a number of pamphlets and articles for periodicals (1815-19), which were very influential and became quite popular. This constant endeavor to introduce his ethical views into the relations of practical life brought upon him the censure of the government on the occasion when the Erlangen theological student Karl Sand, a member of the Jena Burschenschaft as well, startled the German world by assassinating the dramatist August von Kotzebue under the impulse of an enthusiastic patriotism (March 23, 1819). Kotzebue had been strongly opposed to the success of the liberal movement then being made. De Wette addressed to the mother of this misguided youth a paper in which he condemned the murder as illegal, immoral, and antagonistic to all moral law, but at the same time characterized the motives from which the action sprang as a most encouraging sign of the times; in explication of which idea he afterwards adduced Jean Paul's judgment of Charlotte Corday. In consequence of having written this letter he was, despite the intervention of the academical senate in his behalf, dismissed from his professorship by command of the king, Oct. 2, 1819. He declined a sum of money offered him in compensation, and retired to Weimar to undertake an edition of Luther's writings (Luther's Briefe, Sendschreiben und Bedenken), of which vol. i appeared in 1825, and the final volume (v) in 1828. A supplementary volume was published by Seidenmann in 1856. This was the first comprehensive and complete edition of Luther's works ever published, and was of itself sufficient to earn for its author the fame of scholarship. In 1822 he published the didactic romance Theodor, oder des Zweiflers Weihe, to which Tholuck replied in 1823 with his Wahre Weihe des Zweiflers.

In 1821 measures were taken by St. Catharine's Church in Brunswick to secure De Wette as its pastor; but, before the arrangement was completed, a call to the theological professorship of Basle was extended, which he accepted. Here he not only taught to the great satisfaction of students, but also lectured in weekly evening assemblies where the cultured people of the place were his constant auditors. In this way he covered a course of ethics, and another on the nature, manifestations, and influence of religion; both of which were published (Berlin, 1823 sq. and 1827). He also gave himself steadily to pulpit labor, in which he had never regularly engaged during his earlier years, and published five volumes of sermons (1825-29), which were supplemented by a sixth volume published after his death (1849). He was, however, simply a teacher in the pulpit—never an orator; and yet the pulpit reacted upon the lecture-room, and led him into the study of theoretical homiletics, the fruit of which appears in his valuable work Andeutungen über Bildung u. Berufsthätigkeit der Geistlichen, etc. He also attempted catechetical works, but without gaining the popular ear.

During De Wette's stay at Basle the practical element in his character was more energetically developed, and introduced a noteworthy change in his religious life. He learned, in contact with different people, to appreciate various forms of religious manifestation which had formerly repelled him, and his polemical tendency gave way to an irenic disposition as his years advanced. He instituted a Griechenverein in 1825, whose object was the advancement of the moral and religious welfare of the newly liberated Greeks, and aided in the founding of a branch Gustav-Adolf Verein for Switzerland (Protestant.-kirchl. Hilfsverein). He was charged, in consequence, with being a convert to ecclesiastical orthodoxy; but there is abundant evidence that he never changed the views he had adopted in earlier life. He persisted in advocating the utmost independence in theological thinking, and in regarding religion as a life rather than a creed; but testified that he knew "that none other name under heaven is given among men whereby we must be saved but that of Jesus, the Crucified One." In addition to his professional employments, De Wette took an amateur interest in art. He did not condemn the drama as immoral, and had even published a drama of his own construction (Berlin, 1823), though moral considerations prevented him from visiting the theatre. He loved music and the formative arts, and impressed their importance on the thought of his students. He wrote a second romance, and published it in 1829 (Heinrich Melchthal, oder Bildung u. Gemeingeist [2 vols.]). A visit to Rome in the winter of 1846 was largely devoted to the study of ecclesiastical art, and gave birth to the attractive book Gedanken über Malerei u. Baukunst, besonders in kirchl. Beziehung (Berlin, 1846).

De Wette's chief occupation, however, was always theology, and his years at Basle were fruitful in theological publications from his hand. He thoroughly revised his version of the Bible, wrote the Einleitung in's N. T., constructed a mass of text-books and articles for periodicals, and crowned his exegetical labors especially with the Kurzgefasstes exeget. Handb. zum N. T. (3 vols. in 11 pts. 1836-48). He possessed in an unusual measure the power of condensed yet precise statement, and evinced it here as in all his works. This commentary was contemporary with Strauss's Leben Jesu, and the author did not hesitate to avow, in his preface to Matthew, his sympathy with Strauss in that writer's opposition to old and new "harmonistics," and in his advocacy of an idealistic and symbolical interpretation of the miracles of Scripture, though he believed that Strauss had gone too far in giving up the historical Jesus. De Wette was twice invited back to Germany, once to become pastor of St. Peter's in Hamburg, and again to accept a professorship at Jena, but declined to return thither. He died, after a brief illness, June 16, 1849. His likeness in oil by Dietter, and his bust by Schlöth, ornament the aula at Basle.

Wettengel, FRIEDRICH TRAUGOTT, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 9, 1750, at Asch, in Bohemia. He studied at Jena and Erlangen. In 1775 he was appointed chaplain to the prince of Reuss, Heinrich XI; in 1780 he was made court preacher, and in 1792 superintendent. He died at Greitz, June 24, 1824. Of his writings we mention, Predigten über die Reden Jesu Christi am Kreuz (Erlangen, 1779):—Sind die symbolischen Bücher ein Joch für die freie evangelisch-lutherische Kirche? (Greitz, 1790). Wettstein (often written Wetstein), Johann Rudolf (1), a learned Swiss theologian (son of the state minister of the same name), was born at Basle, Jan. 5, 1614. He devoted himself chiefly to the classical languages. After a short term as preacher at Basle, he became professor of rhetoric, and in 1637 of Greek, from which he passed in 1644 to the chair of logic, and again in 1656 to that of theology, from which he was finally transferred in 1656 to the department of New-Test. interpretation. He died Dec. 11, 1684, leaving several theological works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Wettstein, Johann Rudolf (2), a Swiss theologian, son of the preceding, was born at Basle, Sept. 1, 1647, and died there, April 24, 1711, as professor of theology (after 1685), leaving the following writings: Origenis Dial. c. Marcionit. Exhortatio ad Martyrium, Responsio ad Africani Epist. de Hist. Susanna Gr. et Lat. cum Notis Edidit (Basle, 1674):—his Deputatio de Prophetis is published in Nor. Lit. Helvet. (1702), p. 127. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 899; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 510; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Wettstein, Johann Jakob, a celebrated New-Test. critic, was born at Basle, March 5, 1693, the second in a family of thirteen children. His father was minister in St. Leonard's Church, and his teachers were the younger Buxtorf, Samuel Werenfels, Iselin, Frey, etc. His attention was early turned upon the manuscripts in the public library and the comparison of codices, and his earliest dissertation had for its subject De Variis N. T. Lectionibus. Travels to Geneva, Lyons, Paris, and England, in connection with which he visited all accessible libraries and made himself acquainted with all the more important manuscripts of the New Test., served to enlarge the range of his views, as did also association with Montfaucon, La Rue, and Bentley. He obtained a chaplaincy in a Dutch regiment of Switzers through Bentley's influence, but in 1717 returned to Basle and was made diaconus communis, and in 1720 deacon of St. Leonard's and assistant to his father. In this station he earned the reputation of an able preacher and faithful pastor; but study being his favorite occupation, he read private lectures on exegesis and systematic theology before a class of young men, and gave his spare moments to the continued comparison of manuscripts in the library. He conceived in this period the idea of publishing a critical edition of the New Test. Iselin and Frey were at the same time studying the codices of the Basle Library for the purpose of aiding Bengel in the preparation of his New Test., and Wettstein came into conflict with them respecting the age of the Basle Codex of the Gospels (E), which he believed to be much lower than they would concede. This dispute soon became personal. Wettstein's orthodoxy had for some time been suspected. He was charged with holding Arian and Socinian errors, and to this fault were now added his alleged critical aberrations. His preference of  $\delta\varsigma$  to  $\Theta\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$  in 1 Tim. iii, 16, on the ground that a careful examination of the Cod. Alexandrin. had convinced him of its genuineness, was credited to an alleged desire of depriving the doctrine of Christ's deity of a proof. Complaints respecting his heterodoxy were expressed even in the Diet of the Confederation, and ultimately a formal process of inquisition was inaugurated against him. Wettstein had taken the precaution, however, to send the manuscript of his New Test. to Holland, and his assailants were accordingly compelled to substantiate their charges from the notes of his pupils, and from the memories of those who had heard him preach. He was ultimately dismissed from his post, May 13, 1730. He found a new place at Amsterdam, as successor to Clericus in the College of the Remonstrants, and thenceforward made Holland his home. The Prolegomena to his New Test. had already been issued anonymously in 1730. In 1751-52 appeared the New Test. itself, the work of his life; but such was the timidity of the age that he was compelled to state the readings he preferred in foot-notes, and to give the received text in the body of his work. William Bowyer, of London, first published a New Test. with Wettstein's improvements in 1763. It contained a wealth of various readings, numerous antiquarian remarks illustrative of the subject-matter, and parallel passages from classical, ecclesiastical, and Rabbinical writers, which made it a valuable aid both to exegesis and criticism. Wettstein had appended to his New Test. two Syriac letters discovered by him and credited to Clemens Romanus, but whose genuineness has since been disproved (the letters to virgins). He earned the reputation of having excelled all his predecessors in the industry and exactness with which he prosecuted the comparison of codices, having personally examined about forty. To him we owe the designation of codices now current in the theological world. He did not long outlive the publication of his book, and died March 22, 1754. His colleague, Jacob Kriehout, delivered a funeral discourse over his remains, which led to a dispute between himself and Frey, of Basle. Previous to his death, Wettstein had been made a member of academies of science in Berlin and London, and of the British Society for the Extension of Christianity. See *Athen. Wetzel, Andreas, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born Jan. 17, 1808, at Weil, in Württemberg. He studied at Tübingen, and in 1831 he arrived in the United States. In Lewis County, N. Y., he commenced his ministerial labors with great success, looking at the same time after his coreligionists in Oneida County. In 1832 he also commenced preaching at Utica. In 1844, the congregation organized there built a church—Zion's Church—and in 1845 Mr. Wetzel left Verona, where he had resided, for Utica, where he labored until the year 1879, when bodily infirmities obliged him to retire from his office. He died Aug. 16, 1880. Mr. Wetzel was highly honored in his ecclesiastical body, in which he held for a great many years the office of treasurer. He also promoted the cause of education within his own Church and the community in which he lived, and took an active part in all movements which tended to elevate the moral standard of the people. (B. P.)

Wetzel (or Wexel), Johann Kaspar, a learned German writer, was born at Meiningen, Feb. 22, 1691, as the son of a poor shoemaker. He was educated at the expense of Bernard, the duke of Saxe-Meiningen, at Halle and Jena. After teaching awhile, he became secretary to a diplomat, and in that capacity visited Italy and Switzerland. He eventually taught again privately, and finally became preacher of the duchess-dowager

(1724) and at Römthild (1728), where he died, Aug. 6, 1755, leaving several works, of which we mention, Hymnographia, oder hist. Lebensbeschreibung der berühmtesten Liederdichter (Herrnstadt, 1719-28, 4 pts.);—Hymnologia Sacra (Nuremberg, 1728);—Hymnologia Passionalis (ibid. 1733);—Hymnologia Polemica (Arnstadt, 1735);—Analecta Hymnica, oder merkwürdige Nachlesen zur Liederhistorie (Gotha, 1751-55, 2 vols.). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 172 sq.; Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Wetzer, HEINRICH JOSEPH, chief editor of the Encyclopædia of Roman Catholic Theology, was born in 1801 at Anzefang, in Electoral Hesse. His early instruction was obtained of pastor Kaiser, at Niederklein; thence he went to the Pädagogium, and subsequently (1820) to the University of Marburg. Under Arnold's and Hartmann's tuition, he devoted himself especially to the study of the Hebrew and Arabic languages. In 1823 he was at Tübingen, engaged in the study of Oriental languages, and in 1824 he received at Freiburg the doctorate of theology and canon law. He then visited Paris, and prosecuted the study of Arabic and Persian under De Sacy, and of Syriac under Quatremère. While in Paris he published from an Arabic manuscript The History of the Coptic Christians down to the 14th Century (1828), as written by a learned imamu of Egypt, accompanying the Arabic text with a Latin version. He had already published A Latin Treatise on the Arian Controversy, A.D. 325-350 (1827). In 1828 he became tutor and extraordinary professor, and in 1830 ordinary professor, of Oriental philology at Freiburg. In 1831 he married. He delivered interesting lectures on the grammar of the Hebrew and Arabic languages, and on the interpretation of Scripture and introduction to the Old Test., etc. In 1840 he published, in connection with L. Van Ess, the Sulzbach edition of the Bible. In the internal disputes which agitated the University of Freiburg, he held strictly Roman Catholic ground. When in 1844 a motion was made in the Chambers of Baden to discontinue that institution of learning, he wrote an essay advocating its preservation. His principal importance, however, grows out of the assent he gave to the plan of publishing a cyclopædia of Roman Catholic theology, as conceived by the bookseller Herder. He was given the direction of the work, and industriously prosecuted it from 1846 until his death, in November, 1853. The work is thoroughly Roman Catholic in tone and spirit, and has doubtless contributed greatly towards fixing the tendency of that theology of late years in Germany. Its treatment of Protestantism, the institutions growing out of it, and the men connected with it is naturally biased; but its polemics are never bitter or extreme. Significant are the brevity and superficial treatment accorded to Sailer (q. v.), and curious the mildness which Fénelon's mystical quietism receives in the article "Bossuet." The immaculate conception of the Virgin is not at all approved of, though it was not yet a dogma of the Church when the Encyclopædia appeared. The entire work, including Supplement, consists of 12 volumes (1847-1856). A complete Index facilitates its use. A new edition is at this writing (1881) in course of publication.—Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Wexford, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Wexfordiense). Wexford is a seaport town of Ireland, capital of Wexford County, on the right bank of the Slaney, where it expands into a harbor, sixty-four miles south-west of Dublin. An ecclesiastical council was held here in 1240 by the bishop of Ferns, in which it was ruled how the debts of deceased curates should be paid. Clerks were forbidden to follow any kind of secular business. The infringers of ecclesiastical liberties, intruders into benefices, incendiaries, poisoners, false witnesses, etc., were excommunicated. Curates were forbidden to excommunicate their parishioners without the bishop's sanction. See Wilkins, Conc. i, 681; Mansi, Concil. (suppl.), ii, 1065.—Landon, Manual of Councils, p. 691.

(besides κῆτος, Matt. xii, 40) of two very closely related Heb. terms: תַּן, tan (or rather תַּנִּין, tannin', as a sing., Ezek. xxxii, 2; "dragon," xxix, 3; elsewhere as a plur. and rendered "dragons," Job xxx, 29; Psa. xlv, 19; Isa. xliii, 22; xxxiv, 13; xxxv, 7; xlii, 20; Jer. ix, 11; x, 22; xiv, 6; xlix, 33; li, 37), and תַּנִּין, tannin' (Gen. i, 21; Job vii, 12; "serpent," Exod. vii, 9, 10, 12; "sea-monster," Lam. iv, 3; elsewhere also "dragon," Deut. xxxii, 33; Neh. ii, 13; Psa. lxxiv, 13; xci, 13; cxlviii, 7; Isa. xxvii, 1; li, 9; Jer. li, 34). The texts where these are used in general present pictures of ruined cities and of desolation in the wilderness, rendering it difficult to determine what kind of creatures in particular are meant, except as may be inferred from other passages (Job xxx, 29; Psa. xlv, 19, 20; Isa. xliii, 22; xxxiv, 13; xxxv, 7; Jer. ix, 11; x, 22; xlix, 33; li, 34, 37). Where the term is associated with beasts or birds of the desert, it clearly indicates serpents of various species, both small and large (Isa. xliii, 20; Psa. xci, 13; also Exod. vi, 9-12), and in one passage a poisonous reptile is distinctly referred to (Deut. xxxii, 33). See SERPENT. In Jer. xiv, 6, where wild asses snuffing up the wind are compared to dragons, the image will appear in its full strength, if we understand by dragons great boas and python-serpents, such as are figured in the Prænestine mosaics. They were common in ancient times, and are still far from rare in the tropics of both continents. Several of the species grow to an enormous size, and, during their periods of activity, are in the habit of raising a considerable portion of their length into a vertical position, like pillars, ten or twelve feet high, in order to survey the vicinity above the surrounding bushes, while with open jaws they drink in a quantity of the current air. The same character exists in smaller serpents; but it is not obvious, unless when, threatening to strike, they stand on end nearly three-fourths of their length. Most, if not all, of these species are mute, or can utter only a hissing sound; and, although the mali-pambu, the great rock-snake of Southern Asia, is said to wail in the night, no naturalist has ever witnessed such a phenomenon, nor heard it asserted that any other boa, python, or erpeton had a real voice; but they hiss, and, like crocodiles, may utter sounds somewhat akin to howling, a fact that will sufficiently explain the passage in Micah (i, 8). When used in connection with rivers, the term probably signifies the crocodile (Psa. lxxiv, 13; Isa. xxvii, 1; li, 9; Ezek. xxix, 3; xxxii, 2), and when allusion is had to larger bodies of water, probably some of the cetaceous mammalia (Gen. i, 21; Psa. cxlviii, 7; Lam. iv, 3). See LEVIATHAN. The above interpretation is according to that of Bochart (Hieroz. ii, 429), who proposes always to read תַּנִּין in the sense of huge serpents; but others, following Rab. Tanchum Hieros., suggest a different etymology for the plur. forms תַּנִּין and תַּנִּין (the isolated case of a sing. form תַּנִּין, in Ezek. xxix, 3, being taken for a corrupt reading for תַּנִּין, as in some MSS.), from the root תַּנַּן, in the tropical sense of stretched out in running, and applied to the jackal, a swift animal, which answers well to the description where these forms occur, being a creature living in deserts (Psa. xlv, 19; Isa. xliii, 22; xxxiv, 13; xxxv, 7; xliii, 20; Jer. ix, 11; x, 22; xiv, 6; xlix, 33; li, 37), suckling its young (Lam. iv, 3), and uttering a wailing cry (Job xx, 29; Mic. i, 8). The other passages in which the forms, sing. תַּנִּין, plur. תַּנִּין, occur are thus left to be explained as before, namely, as signifying, (1) a great fish or sea-monster, e. g. a whale, shark, etc. (Gen. i, 21; Job vii, 12; Isa. xxvii, 1; Psa. cxlviii, 7); (2) a serpent, either in general (Exod. vii, 9-12; Deut. xxxii, 33; Psa. xci, 13), or specially a "dragon" (Jer. li, 34), or the crocodile (Psa. lxxiv, 13), put as a symbol of Egypt (Ezek. xxix, 3, according to the true reading; also xxxii, 2). See DRAGON.

"In the passages where scales and feet are mentioned as belonging to the tan, commentators have shown that the crocodile is intended, which then is synonymous with the leviathan; and they have endeavored also to demonstrate, where tannin draw the dugos to suckle their young, that seals are meant, although cetacea nourish theirs in a similar manner. It may be doubted whether in most of the cases the poetical diction points absolutely to any specific animal, particularly as there is more force and grandeur in a generalized and collective image of the huge monsters of the deep, not inappropriately so called, than in the restriction to any one species, since all are in Gen. i, 26 made collectively subservient to the supremacy of man. But criticism is still more inappropriate when, not contented with pointing to some assumed species, it attempts to rationalize miraculous events by such arguments; as in the case of Jonah, where the fact of whales having a small gullet and not being found in the Mediterranean is adduced to prove that the huge fish תַּן, dag, was not a cetacean, but a shark! Now, if the text be literally taken, the transaction is plainly miraculous, and no longer within the sphere of zoological discussion; and if it be allegorical, as some, we think, erroneously assume, then, whether the prophet was saved by means of a kind of boat called dag, or it be a mystical account of initiation where the neophyte was detained three days in an ark or boat figuratively denominated a fish, or Celtic aranc, the transaction is equally indeterminate; and it assuredly would be derogating from the high dignity of the prophet's mission to convert the event into a mere escape by boat or into a pagan legend such as Hercules, Bacchus, Jemshid, and other deified heroes of the remotest antiquity are fabled to have undergone, and which all the ancient mysteries, including the Druidical, symbolized. It may be observed, besides, of cetaceous animals that, though less frequent in the Mediterranean than in the ocean, they are far from being unknown there. Joppa, now Jaffa, the very place whence Jonah set sail, displayed for ages in one of its pagan temples huge bones of a species of whale, which the legends of the place pretended were those of the dragon monster slain by Perseus, as represented in the Arkite mythus of that hero and Andromeda, and which remained in that spot till the conquering Romans carried them in triumph to the great city. Procopius mentions a huge sea-monster in the Propontis, taken during his prefecture of Constantinople, in the 36th year of Justinian (A.D. 562), after having destroyed vessels at certain intervals for more than fifty years. Rondoletius enumerates several whales stranded or taken on the coasts of the Mediterranean; these were most likely all orca, physeters, or campe-dolios, i. e. toothed whales, as large and more fierce than the myticetes, which have balein in the mouth, and at present very rarely make their way farther south than the Bay of Biscay; though in early times it is probable they visited the Mediterranean, since they have been seen within the tropics. In the Syrian seas, the Belgian pilgrim Lavaers, on his passage from Malta to Palestine, incidentally mentions a 'Tonyvrisch,' which he further denominates an 'oil-fish,' longer than the vessel, leisurely swimming along, and which the seamen said prognosticated bad weather. On the island of Zerbi, close to the African coast, the late Commander Davies, R.N., found the bones of a cachalot on the beach. Shaw mentions an orca more than sixty feet in length stranded at Algiers; and the late Admiral Ross Donelly saw one in the Mediterranean near the island of Albaran. There are, besides, numerous sharks of the largest species in the seas of the Levant, and also in the Arabian Gulf and Red Sea, as well as cetacea, of which Balæna bitan is the largest in those seas, and two species of halicore or dugong, which are herbivorous animals, intermediate between whales and seals."

"Much criticism has been expended on the scriptural account of Jonah being swallowed by a large fish; it has been variously understood as a literal transaction, as an entire fiction or an allegory, as a poetical mythos or a parable. With regard to the remarks of those writers who ground their objections upon the denial of miracle, it is obvious that this is not the place for discussion; the question of Jonah in the fish's belly will share the same fate as any other miracle recorded in the Old Test. (See Herthenstein, De Piscé qui Jonam Devoravit [Vitemb. 1705].) The reader will find in Rosenmüller's Prolegomena several attempts by various writers to explain the scriptural narrative, none of which, however, have anything to recommend them, unless it be in some cases the ingenuity of the authors, such as, for instance, that of Godfrey Less, who supposed that the 'fish' was no animal at all, but a ship with the figure of a fish painted on the stern, into which Jonah was received after he had been cast out of his own vessel! Equally curious is the explanation of G. C. Anton, who endeavored to solve the difficulty by supposing that just as the prophet was thrown into the water, the dead carcass of some large fish floated by, into the belly of which he contrived to get, and that thus he was drifted to the shore! The opinion of Rosenmüller, that the whole account is founded on the Phœnician fable of Hercules devoured by a sea-monster sent by Neptune (Lycophron, Cassand. 38), although sanctioned by Gesenius, Winer, Ewald, and other German writers, is opposed to all sound principles of Biblical exegesis. It will be our purpose to consider what portion of the occurrence partakes of a natural and what of a miraculous nature. In the first place, then, it is necessary to observe that the Greek word κῆτος, used by Matthew, is not restricted in its meaning to 'a whale,' or any cetacean; like the Latin cete or cetus, it may denote any sea-monster, either 'a whale,' or 'a shark,' or 'a seal,' or 'a tunny of enormous size' (see Athen. p. 303 b [ed. Dindorf]; Odys. xii, 97; iv, 446, 452, Iliad, xx, 147). Although two or three species of whale are found in the Mediterranean Sea, yet the 'great fish' that swallowed the prophet cannot properly be identified with any cetacean, for, although the sperm-whale (Caodon macrocephalus) has a gullet sufficiently large to admit the body of a man, yet it can hardly be the fish intended; as the natural food of cetaceans consists of small animals, such as medusæ and crustacea. Nor, again, can we agree with bishop Jebb (Sacred Literature, p. 178, 179) that the κοιλία of the Greek Test. denotes the back portion of a whale's mouth, in the cavity of which the prophet was concealed; for the whole passage in Jonah is clearly opposed to such an interpretation. The only fish, then, capable of swallowing a man would be a large specimen of the white shark (Carcharias vulgaris), that dreaded enemy of sailors, and the most voracious of the family of Squalide. This shark, which sometimes attains the length of thirty feet, is quite able to swallow a man whole. Some commentators are sceptical on this point. It would, however, be easy to quote passages from the writings of authors and travellers in proof of this assertion; we confine ourselves to two or three extracts. The shark 'has a large gullet, and in the belly of it are sometimes found the bodies of men half eaten; sometimes whole and entire' (Nature Displayed, iii, 140). But lest the abbé Pluche should not be considered sufficient authority, we give a quotation from Mr. Couch's recent publication, A History of the Fishes of the British Islands. Speaking of white sharks, this author, who has paid much attention to the habits of fish, states that 'they usually cut asunder any object of considerable size and thus swallow it; but if they find a difficulty in doing this, there is no hesitation in passing into the stomach even what is of enormous bulk; and the formation of the jaws and throat render this a matter of but little difficulty.' Ruysch says that the whole body of a man in armor (loricatus) has been found in the stomach of a white shark; and Captain King, in his Survey of Australia, says he had caught one which could have swallowed a man with the greatest ease. Blumenbach mentions that a whole horse has been found in a shark, and Captain Basil Hall reports the taking of one in which, besides other things, he found the whole skin of a buffalo which a short time before had been thrown overboard from his ship (i, 27). Dr. Baird, of the British Museum (Cyclop. of Nat. Sciences, p. 514), says that in the river Hooghly, below Calcutta, he had seen a white shark swallow a bullock's head and horns entire, and he speaks also of a shark's mouth being 'sufficiently wide to receive the body of a man.' Wherever, therefore the Tarshish, to which Jonah's ship was bound, was situated, whether in Spain or in Cilicia or in Ceylon, it is certain that the common white shark might have been seen on the voyage. The C. vulgaris is not uncommon in the Mediterranean; it occurs, as Forskål (Descript. Animal. p. 20) assures us, in the Arabian Gulf, and is common also in the Indian Ocean. So far for the natural portion of the subject. But how Jonah could have been swallowed whole unhurt, or how he could have existed for any time in the shark's belly, it is impossible to explain by simply natural causes. Certainly the preservation of Jonah in a fish's belly is not more remarkable than that of the three children in the midst of Nebuchadnezzar's 'burning fiery furnace.' Naturalists have recorded that sharks have the habit of throwing up again whole and alive the prey they have seized (see Couch's Hist. of Fishes, i, 83). 'I have heard,' says Mr. Darwin, 'from Dr. Allen of Forres, that he has frequently found a Diodon floating alive and distended in the stomach of a shark; and that on several occasions he has known it eat its way out, not only through the coats of the stomach, but through the sides of the monster, which has been thus killed.'

Whalley, RICHARD CHAPPLE, D.D., a Church of England divine, was born in 1749. He received a superior education; displayed a passionate love for the fine arts in his youth; travelled extensively in Italy; and finally returned home, given much to scepticism. He became converted, however, soon after, and took orders. He travelled in Europe in 1786; and on returning, in 1787, was ordained to the ministerial office at Horsington, where he continued to reside and officiate for thirteen years. Through the school of affliction, in the loss of his wife and child, his religious knowledge and character were deepened and perfected. He died Nov. 17, 1816. See Christian Guardian, 1847, p. 1, 49.

Wharton, CHARLES H., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Maryland, May 25, 1748. At the age of twelve he was sent to the English College of St. Omer's, where he was educated a Roman Catholic. Little is known from this till his ordination in 1772, except that he was a teacher of mathematics for some time at Liege. In 1783 he returned to America; and in 1785 was rector of Immanuel Church, Newcastle, Del. Subsequently he was connected with the Swedish Church at Wilmington. In 1798 he served St. Mary's, Burlington, where he continued for upwards of thirty-five years, with great usefulness; and in 1801 he became president of Columbia College, N. Y. He died July 23, 1833. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 335.

Whatcoat, RICHARD, a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Quinton, Gloucestershire, England, Feb. 23, 1736. He enjoyed the influences of an early religious education; was converted Sept. 8, 1758; and was immediately placed in official positions by the society at Wednesbury, where he resided. In 1769 he entered as a probationer into the itinerant connection of Wesleyan Methodist preachers, then under the superintendence of Mr. Wesley. He preached extensively through England, Ireland, and the principality of Wales; and was selected by Mr. Wesley to aid in the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America. He was ordained in September, 1784, by John Wesley, assisted by Dr. Coke and Mr. Creighton, as deacon and elder; and, accompanying Dr. Coke, landed in America Nov. 3, 1784. From the organization of our Church at the Christmas Conference until his election to the office of a bishop, he discharged, with the exception of three years, the duties of presiding elder, "which, in those days especially, required labors and privations of no ordinary character, as both the districts and circuits were large, the people in general poor, and the calls for preaching numerous and often far apart." At the General Conference in May, 1800, such was the health of bishop Asbury that he thought of resigning; but the Conference, in order to relieve him, elected bishop Whatcoat, he having a majority of four votes over Jesse Lee. Boehm, in his Reminiscences, says, "I witnessed the excitement attending the different ballottings. The first, no election; the second, a tie; the third, Richard Whatcoat was elected." The same authority gives a momentary view of the ordination Sabbath. "Sunday, the 18th, was a great day in Baltimore among the Methodists. The ordination sermon was preached by Rev. Thomas Coke, LL.D., in Light Street Church. Crowds at an early hour thronged the temple. The doctor preached from Rev. ii, 8: 'And unto the angel of the church in Smyrna write, These things saith the first and the last, which was dead, and is alive,' etc. After the sermon, which was adapted to the occasion, Richard Whatcoat was ordained a bishop in the Church of God by the imposition of the hands of Dr. Coke and bishop Asbury, assisted by several elders. Never were holier hands laid upon a holier head. In those days we went 'out into the highways and hedges and compelled them to come in.' That afternoon Jesse Lee preached in the market-house, on Howard's Hill, from John xvii, 3: 'And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent.' The Lord was there in a powerful manner; several were converted." From the time of his election as bishop until he was disabled by sickness and debility, he travelled regularly through his vast diocese, which extended over the entire continent, preaching almost every day to the people, visiting the annual conferences, sometimes in company with his venerable colleague, bishop Asbury, and sometimes alone, discharging his responsible duties with marked satisfaction to all concerned. In 1806 he met the Baltimore Conference in company with bishop Asbury, and at the adjournment of Conference travelled through the eastern shore of Maryland towards Philadelphia. His last sermon was preached in Milford, Del., on April 8. He had "finished his sixth episcopal tour through the work after his consecration," says Dr. Phœbus, his biographer, "or near that; and, after great suffering, he got an honorable discharge from the Captain of his salvation, and by his permission came in from his post which he had faithfully kept for fifty years." He took refuge at the home of senator Bassett, Dover, Del., where he died, "in the full assurance of faith," July 5, 1806. He was buried under the altar of Wesley Chapel, in the outskirts of Dover. Bishop Asbury, some time after his death, visiting the place of his sepulture, preached his funeral sermon from 2 Tim. iii, 10. In the course of his sermon he declared that such was his unabated charity, his ardent love to God and man, his patience and resignation amid the unavoidable ills of life, that he always exemplified the tempers and conduct of a most devoted servant of God and of an exemplary Christian minister. Bishop Whatcoat was not a man of deep erudition nor extensive science; but he was thoroughly acquainted with Wesleyan theology, and well versed in all the varying systems of divinity. As a preacher his discourses were plain, instructive, and highly spiritual. His distinguishing trait of character was a meekness and modesty of spirit which, united with a simplicity of intention and gravity of deportment, commended him to all

as a pattern worthy of their imitation. Laban Clark said of him, "I think I may safely say, if I ever knew one who came up to St. James's description of a perfect man—one who bridled his tongue and kept in subjection his whole body—that man was bishop Whatcoat." Whately, RICHARD, D.D., an eminent Anglican prelate and writer, was born in Cavendish Square, London, in 1787. His father was the Rev. J. Whately, D.D., prebendary of Bristol Cathedral, and proprietor of Nonsuch Park, Suffolk, whose brother, Thomas Whately, the private secretary to lord Suffolk, was the author of Observations on Modern Gardening, and Remarks on Some of the Characters of Shakspeare. His mother was a daughter of W. Plummer, Esq., of Ware Park, in Hertfordshire. He was carefully educated, chiefly in private, at Nonsuch Park, and early entered Oriel College as a commoner, under the tutorship of Dr. E. Copleston, then head of the college, and afterwards bishop of Llandaff (1776–1849). From public lectures, private conversation, and personal study, Whately acquired a reputation as a sound thinker. His active, ingenious, and fertile mind found scope in the university studies; and in the stir of ecclesiastical politics, then "sounding on their dim and perilous way" towards Tractarianism, he kept a heedful and safe course. At the Michaelmas term in 1808 he graduated as A.B., taking a second-class in litteris humanioribus and in disciplinis mathematicæ et physicæ, when the late Sir R. Peel went up from Christ Church and came out in both the only first-class man of his year. In 1810 Whately gained the chancellor's (lord William Wyndham Grenville's) prize of £20 for the best English essay on What are the arts in the cultivation of which the moderns have been less successful than the ancients? In 1811 he was chosen one of the eighteen fellows of Oriel College, graduated as A.M. in 1812, and then began to act as tutor in his college, in which office, by his felicitous style of teaching, he produced more first-class graduates than any other tutor of his day.

In 1818 Whately contributed his article on Logic to the Encyclopædia Metropolitana. To the same work he also contributed the original outline of his Elements of Rhetoric. These writings were too important and useful to be kept shut up in the huge miscellany of learning in which they at first appeared, and were, on urgent demand, republished in 1825. The former, in which, as the late Prof. Spalding said, he "has expounded the Aristotelian or syllogistic logic with admirable clearness and method, and illustrated it with characteristic sagacity," was severely commented upon by Sir G. C. Lewis, by George Bentham, nephew of the philosopher of Westminster, and notably by Sir W. Hamilton in his paper (subsequently republished) in the Edinburgh Review for April, 1833. Even by these opponents it is admitted that "a new life was suddenly communicated to the study" of logic by the publication of this work; and we may safely trust the decision of John S. Mill, that in it the student will find stated with philosophical precision, and explained with remarkable perspicuity, the whole of the common doctrine of the "syllogism." The latter work, that on Rhetoric, was immediately accepted as a text-book. De Quincey early acknowledged "the acuteness and originality which illuminate every part of the book," and asserted that "in any elementary work it has not been our fortune to witness a rarer combination of analytical acuteness with severity of judgment." In 1819 Whately issued anonymously his ingeniously grave logical satire on scepticism, entitled Historic Doubts Relative to the Existence of Napoleon Bonaparte. In 1822 appeared his Bampton Lectures, on The Use and Abuse of Party Feeling in Religion. This subject is treated with delicacy, discrimination, and liberality, and the series has been frequently reissued.

Meanwhile Whately became by marriage, in 1821, a member "not on the foundation" of Oriel. His wife was a daughter of Wm. Pope, Esq., of Hillingdon, Middlesex, a lady of talent, taste, accomplishments, and literary capacity. Shortly after his marriage he accepted the rectorship of Halesworth, with the vicarage of Chediston, deanery of Dunwich, in the Blything Hundred of Suffolk. In 1825 Whately succeeded Peter Elmsley as principal of St. Alban's Hall. His Logic and Rhetoric were then republished as separate and independent works. In 1828 he published his Essays on Some of the Difficulties in the Writings of the Apostle Paul, which had been preceded by a series on Some of the Peculiarities of the Christian Religion, and were succeeded by The Errors of Romanism having their Origin in Human Nature, etc. In 1830 his Thoughts on the Sabbath were issued by Mr. Fellowes, of Ludgate Hill, himself a miscellaneous writer. This book was made the occasion of a prosecution for stamp-duty, to which all publications except books of piety and devotion were then liable. The publisher was fined £20, and, on remonstrance that the book was within the protection of the statute anent "piety and devotion," he was answered that it was rather the contrary, because Mr. Whately controverts the Mosaic law, and inculcates that we may do just the same on Sabbaths as on other days." Several series of Sermons, Charges, and Tracts were published in 1830, 1833, and 1836. In 1831 Earl Grey, then premier, promoted the logician, theologian, and politician of St. Alban's Hall to the primacy of Ireland. The appointment was at first the occasion of much animadversion. Suspicion was sown in the minds of the clergy, and dislike was shown in their conduct. But Whately's honest impartiality disarmed hostility, and he soon gained the hearts of clergy and people. Bishop Copleston said, Whately "accepted the arduous station proposed to him purely, I believe, from public spirit and a sense of duty. Wealth and honor and title and power have no charm for him. He has great energy and intrepidity; a hardihood which sustains him against obloquy when he knows he is discharging a duty; and he is generous and disinterested almost to a fault. His enlarged views, his sincerity, and his freedom from prejudice are more than a compensation for his want of conciliating manner." The labors of the episcopate, great as they were, could not exhaust his power of working. In 1828 he had composed a paper on Transportation, in which he argued against convict colonies. He followed this up in 1832 with Thoughts on Secondary Punishments, and in 1834 with Remarks on Transportation. In these he had "the distinguished honor," says Henry Rogers, "of being the first who treated the subject comprehensively, or who succeeded in exciting any considerable degree of attention to it." In the parliamentary report on this topic in 1838 nearly all the opinions of archbishop Whately were adopted, and the carrying-out of his principles was recommended. The question of the treatment of criminals did not use up all his sympathies. The cause of national education was advocated by him with force and pertinacity, and chiefly through his sagacity the national schools of Ireland, under the commissioners of education, were placed on a workable and useful foundation. For these schools (in particular) he composed several treatises; among others, his able little work, Easy Lessons on Reasoning, as well as those on Money Matters; Morals; Mind; and British Constitution. For scholastic purposes, too, he wrote for the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge his candid Lessons on the History of Religious Worship, and his simple yet effective Lessons on Christian Evidences—the former of which has been translated into French and Italian, and the latter not only into these two tongues, but also into Spanish, Swedish, German, Greek, and Hebrew. Explanations of the Bi- ble and Prayer-book and Lectures on Prayer may also be regarded as additions to the educational repertoire. During the years 1833-41 the Tracts for the Times were issued, and for some years after Tractarianism was active and influential in the Church and in the university. The movement reached its crisis about 1843-45 in the withdrawal from the English communion of the author of Tract 90—Dr. J. H. Newman—and several others. Newman had been a friend of Whately's, and had "actually composed a considerable portion," and was "the original author of several pages," of Whately's famous work on Logic "as it now stands." Yet Whately did not shrink from duty at the call of friendship, but produced, as occasion seemed to demand, his quiet, lucid, logical, and pithy Cautions for the Times, and with more special reference to the material doctrines and theories involved in the hurricane of controversy with which the Church was assailed, he issued in 1841 a truly admirable work, The Kingdom of Christ Delimited. In his Charge in 1843 he characterizes the prevailing opinions on subscription in a non-natural sense as "dangerous, disgraceful, and ruinous." Cognate topics occupy his charge for 1844, entitled Thoughts on Church Government; for 1846, on The Danger of Divisions within the Church; for 1851, on Protective Measures on Behalf of the Established Church. The Maynooth question is reviewed in Reflections on a Grant to a Roman Catholic Seminary, a charge delivered in 1845. On the failure of the potato crop in Ireland, he issued an Address to the Clergy and Other Members of the Established Church on the Use and Abuse of the Present Occasion for the Exercise of Benevolence; and the same topic occupied him in 1848, when he gave a charge on The Right Use of National Afflictions. The Tractarian doctrine of regeneration called from him in 1850 a charge on Infant Baptism; and every subsequent year found him holding himself abreast of the tide of speculative or practical difficulty, and able to teach his clergy to "buffet it aside with hearts of controversy." After the conference on Christian union, held at Liverpool in October, 1845, which resulted in the establishment of the Evangelical Alliance, Whately, early in 1846, issued Thoughts on the Proposed Evangelical Alliance, in which he expressed a fear that it would become an organized intolerance, or occasion a surrender of truth for the mere sake of an outward unity; and "condemned as schismatical" the setting-up, by persons engaged in the ministry, of "extraneous combinations independently of their own Church authorities," or the becoming members of those combinations when set up. He thus continued active in literature and public matters of importance until his death, which occurred at Dublin, Oct. 8, 1863.

Whately's works not already noticed are chiefly the following: Introductory Lessons on the Studies of St. Paul's Epistles (1849);—Scripture Revelations concerning Good and Evil Angels (1851);—English Synonyms (ed.) ;—Bacon's Essays, with Annotations (1856);—Lectures on Some of the Parables (1859);—Lectures on Prayer (1860);—Thoughts on the Proposed Revision of the Liturgy (ed.) ;—A General View of the Rise, Progress, and Corruptions of Christianity (ed.) ;—and Miscellaneous Lectures and Reviews (1861). Since his death two volumes of Remains have appeared. His Life and Correspondence (1866, 2 vols.) has been published by his daughter, Miss E. Jane Whately. See also Memoirs (1864), by William J. Fitzpatrick.

Wheat (חִטָּה, chittáh [for חִנְתָּה, chintáh]; Chald. plur. חִנְתִּין, chintin; σῖτος, the well-known valuable cereal cultivated from the earliest times, occurs in various passages of Scripture (Heb. Gen. xxx, 14; Exod. ix, 32; xxix, 2; xxxiv, 22; Deut. viii, 8; xxxii, 14; Judg. vi, 11; xv, 1; Ruth ii, 23; 1 Sam. vi, 13; xii, 17; 2 Sam. iv, 6; xvii, 28; 1 Kings v, 11; 1 Chron. xxi, 20, 22; 2 Chron. ii, 10, 15; xxvii, 5; Job xxxi, 40; Psa. lxxxi, 16; cxlvii, 14; Cant. vii, 2; Isa. xlviii, 25; Jer. xii, 13; xli, 8; Ezek. iv, 9; xxvii, 17; xlv, 18; Joel i,

11; Chald. Ezra vi, 9; vii, 22; Greek Matt. iii, 12; xiii, 25, 29, 30; Mark iv, 28 ["corn"]; Luke iii, 17; xvi, 7; xxii, 31; John xii, 24; Acts vii, 12 ["corn"]; xxvii, 38; 1 Cor. xv, 37; Rev. vi, 6; xviii, 13; also Judith iii, 3; Eccles. xxxix, 26). In the A. V. the Heb. words bar (בָּר or בַּר, Jer. xxiii, 28; Joel ii, 24; Amos v, 11; viii, 5, 6), dagán (דָּגָן, Numb. xviii, 12; Jer. xxxi, 12), riphóth (רִיפּוֹת, Prov. xxvii, 22), are occasionally translated "wheat," but there is no doubt that the proper name of this cereal, as distinguished from "barley," "spelt," etc., is chittáh (חִטָּה; Chald. חִיטִּין, chintin). As to the former Hebrew terms, see under CORN. There can be no doubt that chittáh, by some written chitha, chettelh, cheteh, etc., is correctly translated "wheat," from its close resemblance to the Arabic, as well to the names of wheat in other languages. Celsius says, "חִטָּה, chitha, occultato 3 in puncto dagesch, pro חִנְטָה, chintu, dicitur ex usu Ebraeorum." This brings it still nearer to the Arabic name of wheat, which in Roman characters is variously written, hinte, hinthe, henta, and by Pemptius, in his translation of Avicenna, hintha; and under this name it is described by the Arabic authors on Materia Medica. As the Arabic hu is in many words converted into kha, it is evident that the Hebrew and Arabic names of wheat are the same, especially as the Hebrew ח has the guttural sound. Different derivations have been given of the word chittáh: by Celsius it is derived from "חָנַט, chanát, protulit, produxit, fructum, ex Cant. ii, 13;" or the Arabic "chanat, rubuit, quod triticum rubello sit colore" (Hierobot. ii, 113). The translator of the Biblical Botany of Rosenmüller justly observes that "the similarity in sound between the Hebrew word chittáh and the English wheat is obvious. Be it remembered that the ch here is identical in sound with the Gaelic guttural, or the Spanish X. It is further remarkable that the Hebrew term is etymologically cognate with the words for wheat used by every one of the Teutonic and Scandinavian nations (thus we have in Icelandic, hveiti; Danish, hvede; Swedish, hvet; Mæso-Goth, hwaite; German, Weizen); and that, in this instance, there is no resemblance between the Scandinavian and Teutonic terms, and the Greek, Latin, and Slavonic (for the Greek word is σπῆδος; the Latin, frumentum or tritium; the Russian, psenitsa; Polish, pszenica); and yet the general resemblance between the Slavonic, the Thracian, and the Gothic languages is so strong that no philologist now doubts their identity of origin" (loc. cit. p. 75). Rosenmüller further remarks that in Egypt and in Barbary kamich is the usual name for wheat (quoting Descrip. de l'Égypte, xix, 45; Höst, Account of Maroko and Fez, p. 309); and also that in Hebrew, קִמֵּיךְ, kémich, denotes the flour of wheat (Gen. xviii, 6; Numb. v, 15). This, it is curious to observe, is not very unlike the Indian name of wheat, kumu. All these names indicate communication between the nations of antiquity, as well as point to a common origin of wheat. Thus in his Himalayan Botany, Dr. J. F. Boyle has stated: "Wheat, having been one of the earliest-cultivated grains, is most probably of Asiatic origin, as no doubt Asia was the earliest-civilized as well as the first-peopled country. It is known to the Arabs under the name of hinte; to the Persians as gundum; Hindû, gehûn and kumuk. The species of barley cultivated in the plains of India, and known by the Hindû and Persian name jao, Arabic shair, is Hound hexæstichum. As both wheat and barley are cultivated in the plains of India in the winter months, where none of the species of these genera are indigenous, it is probable that both have been introduced into India from the north, that is, from the Persian, and perhaps from the Tartarian region, where these and other species of barley are most successfully and abundantly cultivated" (p. 419). Different species of wheat were no doubt cultivated by the ancients, as Triticum compositum in Egypt, T. aestivum, T. hibernum in Syria, etc.; but both barley and wheat are too well known to require further illustration in this place.

Much has been written on the subject of the origin of wheat, and the question appears to be still undecided. It is said that the Triticum vulgare has been found wild in some parts of Persia and Siberia, apparently removed from the influence of cultivation (English Cyclop. s. v. "Triticum"). Again, from the experiments of M. Esprit Fabre of Agde, it would seem that the numerous varieties of cultivated wheat are merely improved transformations of Egilops ovata (Journal of the Royal Agricult. Soc. No. 38, p. 167-180). M. Fabre's experiments, however, have not been deemed conclusive by some botanists (see an interesting paper by the late Prof. Henfrey in No. 41 of the Journal quoted above). Egypt in ancient times was celebrated for the growth of its wheat. The best quality, according to Pliny (Nat. Hist. xviii, 7), was grown in the Thebaid; it was all bearded; and the same varieties, Wilkinson writes (Anc. Egypt. [ed. 1854], ii, 39), "existed in ancient as in modern times, among which may be mentioned the seven-eared quality described in Pharaoh's dream" (Gen. xli, 22). This is the so-called mummy-wheat, which, it has been said, has germinated after the lapse of thousands of years; but it is now known that the whole thing was a fraud. Babylonia was also noted for the excellence of its wheat and other cereals. "In grain," says Herodotus (i, 193), "it will yield commonly two-hundredfold, and at its greatest production as much as three-hundredfold. The blades of the wheat and barley plants are often four fingers broad." But this is a great exaggeration (see also Theophrastus, Hist. Plant. viii, 7). Modern writers, as Chesney and Rich, bear testimony to the great fertility of Mesopotamia. Syria and Palestine produced wheat of fine quality and in large quantities (Psa. cxlvii, 14; lxxxi, 16, etc.). There appear to be two or three kinds of wheat at present grown in Palestine—the Triticum vulgare (var. hibernum), the T. spelta [see RYE], and another variety of bearded wheat which appears to be the same as the Egyptian kind, the T. compositum. In the parable of the sower, our Lord alludes to grains of wheat which in good ground produce a hundredfold (Matt. xiii, 8). "The return of a hundred for one," says Trench, "is not unheard of in the East, though always mentioned as something extraordinary." Laborde says, "There is to be found at Kerek a species of hundred wheat which justifies the text of the Bible against the charges of exaggeration of which it has been the object." The common Triticum vulgare will sometimes produce one hundred grains in the ear. Wheat is reaped towards the end of April, in May, and in June, according to the differences of soil and position. It was sown either broadcast, and then ploughed in or trampled in by cattle (Isa. xxxii, 20), or in rows, if we rightly understand Isa. xxviii, 25, which seems to imply that the seeds were planted apart in order to insure larger and fuller ears. The wheat was put into the ground in the winter, and some time after the barley. In the Egyptian plague of hail, consequently, the barley suffered, but the wheat had not appeared, and so escaped injury. Wheat was ground into flour. The finest qualities were expressed by the term "fat of kidneys of wheat" (פֶּתֶחַ כִּיֶּנֶת חֶמֶת, Deut. xxxii, 14). Unripe ears are sometimes cut off from the stalks, roasted in an oven, mashed and boiled, and eaten by the modern Egyptians (Sonnini, Travels). Rosenmüller (Botany of the Bible, p. 80), with good reason, conjectures that this dish, which the Arabs call ferik, is the same as the gôres carmél (פֶּרֶחַ מֶלֶךְ) of Lev. ii, 14 and 2 Kings iv, 42. The Heb. word kali (קָלִי, Lev. ii, 14) denotes, it is probable, roasted ears of corn, still used as food in the East. An "ear of corn" was called shibboleth (שִׁבּוּלֶת), the word which betrayed the Ephraimites (Judg. xii, 1, 6), who were unable to give the sound of sh. The curious expression in Prov. xxvii, 22, "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him," appears to point to the custom of mixing the grains of inferior cereals with wheat; the meaning will then be, "Let a fool be ever so much in the company of wise men, yet he will continue a fool." Maurer (Comment. loc. cit.) simply explains the passage thus: "Quomodocunque tractaveris stultum non patietur se emendari." See CEREALS.

Wheat was known to the Israelites in Egypt (Exod. ix, 32), and on returning to Canaan they no doubt found it still cultivated as in the days of Reuben (Gen. xxx, 14). Most probably they were the same sorts which were used in both countries; but there were only a few districts of Palestine, such as the plain of Jezreel, which could compete with that magnificent "carse," the delta of Egypt, the finest corn country of the ancient world. At present the wheat crops of Palestine "are very poor and light, and would disgust an English farmer. One may ride and walk through the standing corn without the slightest objection made or harm done. No wonder it is thin, when white crops are raised from the same soil year after year, and no sort of manure put into the ground" (Tristram, Travels, p. 591). See AGRICULTURE.

Wheaton, NATHANIEL S., D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Washington, Conn., Aug. 20, 1792. His preparatory education was acquired at the Episcopal Academy of Cheshire, Conn.; he graduated at Yale College in 1814; was ordained deacon and priest in 1817; was pastor in Anne Arundel, Prince George, and Montgomery counties, Md.; in 1818 became rector of Christ Church, Hartford, Conn., remaining twelve years; in 1831 became president of Trinity (then Washington) College, which office he filled until 1837; in that year became rector of Christ Church, New Orleans, continuing in that position for seven years; in 1844 visited Europe, and on his return published his travels in two volumes. He was a scholar of varied learning. His benefactions to various scientific, philanthropic, and religious objects were large, and his bequests to Trinity College amounted to about twenty thousand dollars. He died at Marble-dale, Conn., March 18, 1862. See Amer. Quar. Church Review, 1862, p. 734.

Wheel (usually and properly [of a carriage] עֶגְלוֹת, ophân, which is invariably so rendered; sometimes [of any circular object] גָּלְגַל, galgal, Psa. lxxxiii, 13; Eccles. xii, 6; Isa. xvii, 13; Jer. xlvii, 3; Ezek. x, 2, 6, 13; xxiii, 24; xxvi, 10; "heaven," Psa. lxxvii, 18; Dan. vii, 9; "rolling thing," Isa. xvii, 13; or גָּלְגַל, galgal, Isa. xxviii, 28; occasionally עֶגְלָה, páam, Judg. v, 28, a step, as often elsewhere; עֶגְלָה, obnáyim, Jer. xviii, 3, of a potter's wheel). We find that the wheels under the brazen laver in Solomon's Temple were cast; they are thus described by the sacred historian: "And the work of the wheels was like the work of a chariot-wheel: their axletrees, and their naves, and their fellowes, and their spokes were all molten" (1 Kings vii, 33). This is illustrated by the Egyptian chariots. A wheel has been found by Dr. Abbott of a curious construction, having a wooden tire to the fellowe, and an inner circle, probably of metal, which passed through and connected its spokes a short distance from the nave (A, A). The diameter of the wheel was about three feet one inch. The fellowe was in six pieces, the end of one overlapping the other. The tire was fastened to it by bands of raw hide passing through long, narrow holes (B, B) made to receive them (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, i, 382). Among the ancient Assyrians the wheels originally had six spokes, and the fellowes consisted of four pieces. They appear to have been thicker and more solid than those of the Egyptians (Layard, Nineveh, ii, 270). Later the wheel had eight and not six spokes, and was apparently strengthened by four pieces of metal which bound the fellowes (ibid. p. 271). See CHARIOT.

Wheeler, Daniel, a distinguished member of the Society of Friends, was born in London, England, Nov. 27, 1771. Early in life he served in both the navy and the army. Having become a Christian, when not far from twenty-five years of age, he joined the Society of Friends. Some years after this, he abandoned a very lucrative part of the business in which he was engaged, that he might devote himself to the work to which, by the Spirit of God, he believed himself called. He became an accredited minister of the Society of Friends in 1816. In 1817 the emperor of Russia, in order to carry out a cherished plan for draining and cultivating the marshes surrounding St. Petersburg, secured the services of Mr. Wheeler as manager of the enterprise. While faithfully discharging his duties in the secular business to which he had been called, he was also faithful to his higher Master, and preached the Gospel with all simplicity and fidelity, not only to the humble and lowly, but also to the higher in authority in Russia. He remained in St. Petersburg until 1832, when he felt impressed that it was his duty to go as a missionary among the islands of the Pacific, where a rich blessing attended his labors. After several years spent in missionary work in the Pacific, he returned to England. Here he remained until 1838, when he came to the United States, where he continued nine months, rendering such service as he could to the cause of Christ, and then went back once more to his native land. During a second voyage to the United States he contracted a disease which proved fatal; and he died soon after landing at New York, Feb. 6, 1840. See Memoir (Phila. 1870). (J. C. S.)

Wheeler (or Wheler), Sir George, D.D., an English clergyman and traveller, was born at Breda, Holland, of English parentage, in 1650. He removed to Kent, England, in childhood; was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford; travelled on the Continent and in the East with Dr. James Spon, of Lyons, in 1675-76; presented a collection of MSS. to the University of Oxford; received the honorary degree of A.M. from Oxford University; was knighted and ordained in 1683; and, having taken orders, was collated by bishop Crewe to the second prebend in the Cathedral of Durham in 1684. In 1685 he was presented to the vicarage of Basingstoke, Hants; in 1702 was created D.D. by diploma from Oxford, and in the following year received the curacy of Whitworth. In 1706 he was collated to the rectory of Winston, and in 1709 to that of Houghton-le-Spring, which he retained until his decease, Jan. 15, 1724. Dr. Wheeler was the author of, A Journey to Greece (1682):—An Account of the Churches or Places of Assembly of the Primitive Christians (1689):—and The Protestant Monastery; or, Christian Economics (1698). He was a man of vast research and ability, and a devoted minister and parent. See Church of England Magazine, viii, 332.

Wheeler, John, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Grafton, Vt., March 11, 1798. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1816, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1819. In 1821 he was ordained over the Church at Windsor, Vt., where he took high rank as a pulpit orator. At the age of twenty-six he declined the presidency of the University of Vermont; but nine years after, upon the resignation of president Marsh, he accepted the honor. From this time his best energies were devoted to the university. He raised up friends for it, carried it through seasons of trial, and elevated the standard of scholarship. He resigned in 1848, and died at Burlington, April 16, 1862. Dr. Wheeler published several Sermons and Discourses, especially that before the Porter Rhetorical Society of Andover Theological Seminary in 1834. See Cong. Quar. 1862, p. 307.

Wheelock, Eleazer, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Windham, Conn., in May, 1711, and graduated from Yale College in 1733. In March, 1735, he was ordained minister of the Second Church in Lebanon, called "Lebanon Crank," now Columbia. In the great Whitefieldian revival Mr. Wheelock engaged with great zeal and energy. After the religious excitement had subsided, he added to his labors as a minister the duties of a teacher. Samson Occum, a Mohegan Indian, who afterwards became a distinguished preacher, was a pupil in his school in 1743. He soon formed the plan of an Indian Missionary School, and several Indian boys entered it, chiefly maintained by subscriptions from the legislatures of Connecticut and Massachusetts. The institution received the name of Moor's Indian Charity School, Joshua Moor having made a donation of a house and two acres of land about the year 1754. Mr. Occum and Rev. Nathaniel Whitaker solicited funds for the school in Great Britain in 1766, the amount realized being £7000 in England, and more than £2000 in Scotland. After conducting this school in Lebanon over fourteen years, he determined to transfer it to New Hampshire, and a charter was obtained for a college, with about 40,000 acres of land, as an endowment from governor Wentworth and others. Thus originated at Hanover, N. H., Dartmouth College; but Moor's school was maintained there for a long time as a separate institution. In August, 1770, Dr. Wheelock went to Hanover, built a log cabin in what was then a wilderness, and put up his school-building, eighty feet long and two stories in height. Among the first graduates was his son John, who succeeded to the presidency of the college. As a teacher Dr. Wheelock was industrious and successful. He died April 24, 1779. Dr. Wheelock published, Narrative of the Indian Charity School at Lebanon (1762):—Narratives, in several numbers, from 1763 to 1771:—Continuation of the Narrative, to which is Added an Abstract of a Mission to the Delaware Indians West of the Ohio (1773):—A Sermon on Liberty of Conscience, or No King but Christ in the Church (1775):—and an occasional Sermon. His Memoirs, by Drs. McClure and Parish, were published in 1811. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 397.

Wheelock, John, D.D., LL.D., an American clergyman, was born at Lebanon, Conn., Jan. 28, 1754. He entered Yale College in 1767, but removed with his father Dr. Eleazer Wheelock, to Hanover, N. H., in 1770, and graduated at Dartmouth College in 1771; was tutor there from 1772 to 1776; was elected to the Colonial Assembly in 1775; appointed major in the New York forces in 1777, and soon after lieutenant-colonel in the Continental army; commanded an expedition against the Indians in 1778, and soon after was placed on general Gates's staff. At the death of his father in 1779, although only twenty-five years of age, he was chosen his successor as president of Dartmouth College; was sent to England to raise money and supplies for the college in 1783, but lost what he had collected by shipwreck off Cape Cod; was removed from his office in consequence of an ecclesiastical controversy in 1815, but restored in 1817, and died soon after, April 4, 1817. He left half of his large estate to Princeton Theological Seminary. He published a Eulogy on Prof. John Smith, D.D. (1809):—and Sketches of Dartmouth College (1816).

Whelan, RICHARD VINCENT, D.D., a Roman Catholic prelate, was born in Baltimore, Md., Jan. 29, 1809. He was educated at Mount St. Mary's College, Emmetsburg, where he became a teacher and prefect of studies; studied theology and philosophy at the Seminary of St. Sulpice, Paris, graduating in 1831; was ordained priest at Versailles the same year; was professor in St. Mary's College from 1832 to 1835; was a missionary in several parts of Virginia and Maryland from 1835 to 1840; became bishop of Richmond in March, 1850, and on the division of the diocese the following year took the title of bishop of Wheeling, where he was active in promoting the interests of Romanism, building up a seminary for young ladies, and a convent at Mount de Chantal; was a member of the Vatican Council of 1869-70, in which he opposed the dogma of infallibility, but gave in his adhesion to it after it was declared. He died at Wheeling, July 7, 1874.

Whelp (וֶלֶד, gór, or וֶלֶד, gúr), the cub of a lion (Gen. xlix, 9; Deut. xxxiii, 22; Jer. li, 38; Ezek. xix, 2, 3, 5; Nah. ii, 13), or of a jackal (Lam. iv, 3). See LION. The cubs of a bear (2 Sam. xvii, 8; Prov. xvii, 12; Hos. xiii, 8) are not designated by the Heb. word. See BEAR.

Whewell, WILLIAM, D.D., a clergyman and professor of the Church of England, was born at Lancaster, England, in 1795. He graduated from Trinity College in 1816, and received the degree of D.D.; was ordained deacon in 1820, and priest in the following year; became master of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1841, and was vice-chancellor of the university. Previous to this he was fellow and tutor of Trinity College, and from 1828 to 1832 was professor of mineralogy in the university; from 1838 to 1855 he was professor of moral theology. Dr. Whewell died at Cambridge, March 6, 1866. As an author he was prolific; among his works being, An Elementary Treatise on Mechanics (1819)—which passed through seven editions:—Analytical Statics (1826):—Architectural Notes on German Churches (1830):—Principles of University Education (1831):—First Principles of Mechanics (1832):—Doctrine of Limits (ed.) :—Treatise of Dynamics (1832-36):—Astronomy and General Physics (1834):—Mechanical Euclid (1837):—History of the Inductive Sciences (ed. 3 vols.):—Philosophy of the Inductive Sciences (1840, 3 vols.):—The Mechanics of Engineering (1841):—Liberal Education (1845):—Verse Translations from the German (1847):—Lectures on the History of Moral Philosophy (1852):—Systematic Morality (1846):—Elements of Morality (1848). He was also editor of an edition of Newton's Principia, first three sections (1846); of Butler's Human Nature (1843); of Butler's Moral Subjects (1849); and of various other scientific works. He was also the author of various scientific articles in leading periodicals, and published many pamphlets and numerous sermons. See Amer. Quar. Church Review, July, 1866, p. 325.

Whichcote, BENJAMIN, D.D., an eminent English divine, was born at Whichcote Hall, in the parish of Stoke, in Shropshire, March 11, 1610. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1629; became a fellow there in 1633; was a distinguished tutor; was ordained in 1636; organized a Sunday-afternoon lectureship at Trinity Church, and became preacher to the university; was presented to the living of North Cadbury, in Somersetshire, in 1643; appointed provost of King's College in 1644; presented to the rectory of Milton, in Cambridgeshire, in 1649; was removed from his provostship at the Restoration in 1661, but retained his rectory at Milton; obtained the living of St. Anne's, Blackfriars, London, in 1662; and the vicarage of St. Lawrence's, Jewry, in 1668. He died while on a visit at Cambridge, in May, 1683. "Dr. Whichcote is regarded as one of the heads, if not the chief founder, of what is called the latitudinarian school of English divines." He enjoyed great fame as a preacher, and left considerable results of his literary labors, although he published nothing during his lifetime. His Observations and Apophthegms (1688), and his Sermons (1698), were edited by the earl of Shaftesbury. Dr. John Jeffery edited his Moral and Religious Aphorisms (1703), and his Discourses (1701-3, 3 vols.), to which Dr. Samuel Clarke added a fourth in 1707. An edition of his Sermons, in 4 vols., accompanied by a Life by Drs. Campbell and Gerard, appeared in 1751.

Whip (שֶׁט, shót; occasionally rendered "scourge," Job v, 21; ix, 23; Isa. x, 26; xxviii, 15). In ancient times, whips were used not only for driving animals, but also as instruments of torture; and even now, in slaveholding countries, the unfortunate slaves are obliged to work with the fear of the whip before their eyes. The system of administering personal chastisement has been, and is, universal throughout the East; and, under despotic governments, no person can be sure of escaping, as punishment is inflicted on the mere caprice of any tyrant who may happen to be in power. For this purpose, however, the rod (q. v.) was oftener used, and punishment of the bastinado (q. v.) is now the most common in Oriental countries. See CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

Various materials were used in the manufacture of whips. In 1 Kings xii, 11, Rehoboam says, "My father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions." Here a simple scourge and another more painful are mentioned in opposition. The latter is called "a scorpion," and probably means to denote a comparison between the pain respectively occasioned by the scourge and the reptile. The rabbins think generally that this scorpion was a scourge composed of knotted and thorny twigs, by which the flesh was severely lacerated. More probably it consisted of thongs set with thorns or sharp iron points. Such scourges were known to the Romans as a means of torturing used by unrelenting persons, and particularly by masters in the punishment of their slaves. Some of the early martyrs were thus tortured. See SCOURGE.

Few travellers have visited Egypt without commiserating the condition of the unhappy Fellahs: every public work is executed by their unpaid labor; half naked and half starved, they toil under a burning sun, to clear out canals or level roads, under the eyes of task-masters ready to punish with their formidable whips, made from the hide of the hippopotamus, the least neglect or relaxation. Such a sight necessarily calls to mind the sufferings endured by the Israelites while they were subjected to the tyranny of Pharaoh. "The Egyptians made the children of Israel to serve with rigor; and they made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in mortar, and in brick, and in all manner of service in the field; all their service wherein they made them serve was with rigor" (Exod. i, 13, 14). The monuments abound with similar scenes. See BRICK.

"In driving, the ancient Egyptians used a whip, like the heroes and charioteers of Homer; and this, or a short stick, was generally employed even for beasts of burden, and for oxen at the plough, in preference to the goad. The whip consisted of a smooth, round wooden handle, and a single or double thong; it sometimes had a lash of leather, or string, about two feet in length, either twisted or plaited; and a loop being attached to the lower end, the archer was enabled to use the bow, while it hung suspended from his wrist" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, i, 372 sq.). See CHARIOT.

Whipple, GEORGE, D.D., a professor of the Congregational Church, was born in Albany, N. Y., June 4, 1805. For a time he was a student in the Oneida Institute; was one year (1833) in the Lane Theological Seminary; and graduated from the theological department of Oberlin College in 1836, in which year he was ordained as an evangelist. From 1836 to 1838 he was principal of the Oberlin preparatory department, and from 1838 to 1847 was professor of mathematics in that institution. From 1846 until his death he was secretary of the American Missionary Association, his office being in New York city. He died in Brooklyn, N. Y., Oct. 6, 1876. See Cong. Quar. 1877, p. 427.

Whiston, WILLIAM, a learned English divine and mathematician, was born at Norton, in Leicestershire, Dec. 9, 1667, where his father was rector of the parish. He was educated at Tamworth School and Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1690; became a fellow of his college, took orders in the Church of England, and was appointed mathematical tutor in 1693; was chaplain to Dr. Moore, bishop of Norwich, from 1694 to 1698; vicar of Lowestoft, in Suffolk, from 1698 to 1701; became deputy to Sir Isaac Newton in the Lucasian professorship of mathematics in 1701, and succeeded him in that chair on his resignation in 1703; was nominated by bishop Moore catechetical lecturer at the Church of St. Clement. By this time he had gained eminence as a preacher, when he adopted Arianism, rejected infant baptism, and began to omit portions of the litany. The bishop of Ely requested him not to fulfil the duties of the Boyle lectureship, in which he was making his views public, but allowed the continuance of the salary. Whiston resigned the lectureship, and, after several hearings before the heads of the houses, was deprived of his lectureship and expelled from the university, Oct. 30, 1710. In consequence of certain theological publications of a controversial character, he was pronounced a heretic by the convocation in 1711, and the prosecution was continued until 1715, when the proceedings were terminated by an "act of grace." After his expulsion from the university he removed to London, where he gave lectures on astronomy and other mathematical sciences, and continued an active theological writer. He became a Baptist and a Millenarian, and gathered a congregation to his own house, to which he preached what he called primitive Christianity. A subscription was made for him in 1721 amounting to £470, and he derived additional income from his lectures and publications. He died in London, Aug. 22, 1752. Among his numerous publications are, A New Theory of the Earth (1696);—The Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies (1708);—Praelectiones Physico- mathematicæ (1710);—Primitive Christianity Revived (1711-12);—A Brief History of the Revival of the Arian Heresy in England (1711);—Athanasius Convicted of Forgery (1712);—Three Essays on Trinitarianism (1713);—A Vindication of the Sibylline Oracles; to which are added the Genuine Oracles Themselves (1715);—Astronomical Lectures (ed.);—St. Clement's and St. Irenæus's Vindication of the Apostolical Constitutions (1716);—Sir Isaac Newton's Mathematical Philosophy Demonstrated (ed.);—Astronomical Principles of Religion, Natural and Revealed (1717);—A Letter to the Earl of Nottingham concerning the Eternity of the Son of God and of the Holy Spirit (1719);—The True Origin of the Sabellian and Athanasian Doctrines of the Trinity (1720);—An Essay towards Restoring the True Text of the Old and New Testaments (1722);—The Literal Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies (1724);—A Collection of Authentic Records belonging to the Old and New Testaments, Translated into English (1727-28);—Historical Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Dr. Samuel Clarke (1730);—The Primitive Eucharist Revived (1736);—The Eternity of Hell Torments Considered (1740);—The Primitive New Testament (1745);—The Sacred History of the Old and New Testaments (ed.);—Memoirs of His Own Life and Writings (1749-50);—and a translation of the Works of Josephus, which has never been superseded except in part. Whitaker, Nathaniel, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Huntington, L. I., Feb. 22, 1722, and graduated at Princeton College in 1752. He was ordained and installed at Woodbridge, N. J., in 1755; was called to Chelsea, near Norwich, Conn., Feb. 25, 1761; and selected by the Connecticut Board of Correspondents for Evangelizing the Indians, to go to Great Britain with the Rev. Sampson Occum, an Indian of the Mohegan tribe, to solicit funds for a mission school. Lady Huntingdon, Romaine, Venn, Wesley, and others showed them great favor, and a considerable sum was raised. After eighteen months' absence, they returned, having prepared the way for founding Dartmouth College. While in England he published several sermons on Reconciliation to God. Difficulties arising in his congregation on the subject of Church government, he accepted a call to the Second Church in Salem, Mass., and was installed July 28, 1769. In 1773, in consequence of a disagreement among the people, Dr. Whitaker, with fourteen others, withdrew from the Church, formed a separate congregation, and united with the Boston Presbytery, which declared the new erection the Third Church. His friends erected a house of worship, but it was soon after burned. Not disheartened, they sought outside help, and in 1776 were enabled to complete a new church. At the breaking-out of the war he warmly espoused the cause of independence, and actually engaged in the manufacture of saltpetre. In a short time he furnished the authorities with two hundred and eighty pounds. On the occasion of the Boston massacre in 1771, he printed a sermon on The Fatal Tragedy in King Street, and on the proclamation of independence another, entitled An Antidote to Toryism; and at the end of the war still another, On the Reward of Toryism. He was dismissed by a council called for that purpose, Feb. 10, 1784, but soon after installed at Norridgewock. After vainly attempting to establish a presbytery in Maine, he went to Virginia, and died at Woodbridge, near Hampton, Jan. 1, 1795, in poverty, notwithstanding all he had done for the Church and country. (W. P. S.)

Whitaker, Thomas Dunham, LL.D., a clergyman of the Church of England, was born at Rainham, in Norfolk, June 8, 1759. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; ordained deacon in 1785, and priest the following year; became perpetual curate of Holme, Lancashire, in 1797; vicar of Whalley in 1809; held for some time the vicarage of Heysham; became vicar of Blackburn in 1818, and remained there until his death, which occurred Dec. 18, 1821. He published, A History of the Original Parish of Whalley and Honor of Clitheroe, in the Counties of Lancaster and York (1801):—History of the Deanery of Craven (1805):—De Motu per Britanniam Civico Annis 1745 et 1746 (1809):—The Life and Original Correspondence of Sir George Radcliffe (1810):—an edition of The Vision of Piers Plowman (ed.) :—a new edition of Thoresby's Ducatus Leodiniensis; or, The Topography of Leeds (1816):—Loidia and Almete; or, An Attempt to Illustrate the Districts Described in these Words by Bede (1816):—besides single sermons and other works.

Whitaker, William, D.D., an eminent English divine, was born at Holme, Lancashire, in 1548. He was educated at St. Paul's School and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was appointed to a fellowship; became regius professor of divinity at Cambridge in 1579; was appointed chancellor of St. Paul's in 1580; and became master of St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1586. He died at Cambridge, Dec. 4, 1595. Mr. Whitaker was an able Calvinistic writer, and a powerful champion of Protestantism against the attacks of popery. He published, The Liturgy of the Church of England, in Latin and Greek (1596):—Catechismus, sive Prima Institutio Disciplinæ Pietatis Christianæ Latine Explicata, etc. (1570):—Ad Rationes Decem Edmundi Campiani Jesuite . . . Responsio, etc. (1581):—A Disputation on Holy Scripture against the Papists, especially Bellarmine and Stapleton (first published in Latin in 1588, afterwards in English):—and other controversial works. A collection of his Opera Theologica was published at Geneva in 1610, 2 vols. fol.

Whitby, DANIEL, D.D., an eminent English divine, was born at Rushden, Northamptonshire, in 1638. He was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1657, and became a fellow in 1664; took holy orders, became chaplain to Dr. Seth Ward, bishop of Salisbury, and was made prebendary of Salisbury in October, 1668; was admitted precentor of the same church in 1672, became rector of St. Edmund's, Salisbury, about the same time, which was his last preferment, and where he died, March 24, 1726. Among his published works are, Romish Doctrines not from the Beginning (1664):—Endeavor to Evince the Certainty of Christian Faith (1671):—Discourse concerning the Idolatry of the Church of Rome (1674):—Absurdity and Idolatry of Host Worship Proved (1679):—The Protestant Reconciler Humbly Pleading for Condescension to Dissenting Brethren (1683). This work was condemned to be burned by the University of Oxford, and publicly retracted by Whitby:—A Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament (1703):—Discourse of the Necessity and Usefulness of the Christian Revelation (1705). Late in life he became an Arian, and engaged in a dispute with Dr. Waterland. He was a voluminous writer, the above-mentioned works being only a small part of what he gave to the public. His Paraphrase and Commentary is considered his best work.

White, Charles, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Randolph, Mass., Dec. 28, 1795. He was a lineal descendant of Peregrine White of the famous "Mayflower;" graduated at Dartmouth College with the first honors of his class in 1821; studied theology at Andover, Mass.; after licensure to preach, was settled as colleague pastor with his stepfather, Rev. Asa Burton, D.D., at Thetford, Vt.; subsequently over the Church in Cazenovia, N. Y., and again at Owego, N. Y.; elected president of Wabash College, Ind., and entered upon his duties in October, 1841, and his presidency was of twenty years' continuance. In this last relation he met the manifold responsibilities of his office with fidelity and energy. He shrank from no labor that the embarrassed condition of the college, when he entered on its presidency, demanded at his hands; and he had the satisfaction of seeing, long before his death, as one result of his labor, a larger number of students in the college classes alone than he found in all the departments when he entered upon the presidency. He died suddenly, Oct. 29, 1861. Dr. White was a ripe and accurate scholar, an able teacher, an impressive preacher, and a sound theologian. He published Essays in Literature and Ethics (Boston, 1853, 12mo), and contributed four sermons to the National Preacher, and articles (the most of which were republished in his Essays) to the Biblical Repository and Bibliotheca Sacra. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1863, p. 313; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (J. L. S.)

White, Francis, D.D., an English prelate who flourished in the early part of the 17th century, was educated at Cambridge; became dean of Carlisle in 1622; bishop of Carlisle in 1626; bishop of Norwich in 1629; bishop of Ely in 1631; and died in February, 1637 or 1638. He was the author of, Orthodox Faith and the Way to the Church Explained and Justified against T. W. (1617):—Replie to Jesuit Fisher's Answer to Certain Questions Propounded by James I., etc. (1624):—Treatise of the Sabbath Day against Sabbatarian Novelty (1636):—and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

White, Henry, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Durham, Greene Co., N. Y., June 19, 1800. He received his preparatory training in the academy at Greencastle; graduated with high honor at Union College in 1824; studied theology in the Princeton (N. J.) Theological Seminary; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Columbia in 1826, and immediately after entered upon an agency for the American Bible Society, his field being in the Southern States. In 1828 he was ordained and installed as pastor of the Allen Street Church, New York city, where he continued until the establishment of the Union Theological Seminary in 1836, when he was elected to the professorship of theology in that institution, which office he continued to hold until his death, Aug. 25, 1850. Dr. White had naturally a strong, discriminating mind, well balanced, and abounding in practical wisdom. As a preacher, he was eminently thoughtful, clear, convincing; and pungent. As a teacher of theology, he had peculiar and almost unrivalled excellence. He published a Sermon on the Death of John Nückie (1838), and a Sermon on the Abrahamic Covenant (1846). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 691, Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (J. L. S.)

White, Joseph (1), D.D., an English clergyman and eminent Oriental scholar, was born at Stroud, in Gloucestershire, in 1746. He was the son of a weaver, and was designed for his father's calling, but having been sent to a charity-school at Gloucester, and having made rapid advancement, he was sent by a gentleman of fortune to Oxford, where he graduated at Wadham College about 1770; became a fellow of that college in 1774, was appointed to archbishop Laud's professorship of Arabic in 1775; chosen in 1783 to preach the Bampton lecture for the following year, in the preparation of which he was assisted by Dr. Parr and Mr. Samuel Badcock; became prebendary of Gloucester in 1788; was appointed rector of Melton in 1790; became prebendary of Oxford in 1802; regius professor of Hebrew at Oxford the same year; and subsequently canon of Christ Church. He died at Oxford, May 22, 1814. He was the author of De Utilitate Lingue Arabicæ in Studiis Theologicis Oratio (1776):—Testamenti Novi Libri Historici et Epistolæ tam Catholicæ quam Paulinæ, Versio Syriaca Philoxeniana, etc. (1779-1803):—A View of Christianity and Mohammedanism (Bampton Lectures) (London, 1784):—and other works of great merit.

White, Joseph (2) (called in Spain Don José María Blanco i Crespo), a Roman Catholic priest, descended from an Irish Catholic family which had settled in Spain, was born at Seville, July 11, 1775. Being dissatisfied with mercantile life, he was educated for the Church, and was ordained a priest in 1799; soon lost confidence in Roman Catholicism, renouncing his adherence to it in 1810, when he removed to England; joined the English Church, but did not take orders in it; became a tutor in the family of Lord Holland; settled in London, where he conducted for some years a Spanish paper called El Español; received, in 1814, a pension for life of £250 per annum, on account of services rendered the government by this paper; lived subsequently in London as a man of letters; edited for three years (1822-25) another Spanish journal, Las Variedades; was editor of the London Review (1829); served as tutor in the family of archbishop Whately at Dublin, from 1832 to 1835; removed to Liverpool, where he joined the Unitarian Society, of which the Rev. John Hamilton was then pastor; and died May 20, 1841. He was the author of a great many works, among which are Preparatory Observations on the Study of Religion (1817);—Letters from Spain (1822);—Practical and Internal Evidence against Catholicism (1825);—Poor Man's Preservative against Popery (1825);—Dialogues concerning the Church of Rome (1827);—Letter to Protestants Converted from Romanism (1827);—Second Travels of an Irish Gentleman in Search of a Religion (1833);—and Life of the Rev. Joseph Blanco White, Written by Himself, with Portions of his Correspondence; edited by John Hamilton Thom (1845, 3 vols.). "This book, at the time of its appearance, excited a good deal of interest, and is still eminently worth referring to. The curious picture it presents of a mind at once pious and sceptical; longing and sorrowing after a truth which it can nowhere find, or, finding, contrive to rest in, has, in the present unsettled state of religious opinion, a very particular significance. Poor White's life-long search for a religion seems not to have been a successful one, and to have landed him at the last in a condition of nearly entire scepticism."

White, Robert Meadows, D.D., an English clergyman and philologist, was born about 1798. He graduated at Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1819; was ordained in 1821; became a tutor at Oxford in 1832; Rawlinson professor of Anglo-Saxon in 1834; visited Denmark in the interests of philology in 1837; became vice-president of Magdalen College in 1838; gave considerable attention to local antiquarian research; was the annalist of his college; and was regarded a leading authority in English philology. During the latter portion of his life he was rector of Slimbridge, Gloucestershire, where he died, Jan. 31, 1865. He devoted a large part of his time, for twenty years, to the editing of The Ormulum, Semi-Saxon Homilies in Verse, now first edited from the Original MSS., with Notes and Glossary (Oxford, 1852).

White, Thomas (1), D.D., an English clergyman, was born at Bristol about 1550; was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he graduated about 1570; took holy orders, and preached frequently; received the living of St. Gregory's in London; became vicar of St. Dunstan's, Fleet Street, in 1575; was made prebendary of Mora, St. Paul's, in 1588, treasurer of Salisbury in 1590; canon of Christ Church in 1591, and canon of Windsor in 1593. He died March 1, 1624. He was noted for his benefactions in founding hospitals and almshouses, but especially for the founding of Sion College, London. His published works consist of a few sermons.

White (Lat. Anglus ex Albis, Candidus, or Vitus; otherwise called Biunchi, Richworth, and Blackloe), Thomas (2), an eminent English philosopher and Roman Catholic priest, was born at Halton, Essex, in 1582; was educated abroad and became a priest in 1617; was employed in teaching philosophy and divinity, residing at Douay, Rome, and Paris with occasional interruptions until 1633, when he was elected principal of the English College at Lisbon; served the duty of the English mission for some years; resided for a considerable time in the house of Sir Kenelm Digby, whose philosophy he supported; became a professor at Douay again in 1650, and vice-principal of the English College; spent his latter years in England, and died at Drury Lane, London, July 6, 1676. He was a voluminous writer, and among his numerous works the following deserve mention: Dialogues concerning the Judgment of Common Sense in the Choice of Religion (1640);—De Mundo Dialogi Tres (1642);—Institutionum Peripateticarum ad Mentem, etc. (1646);—Institutiones Theologicæ super Fundamentis in Peripatetica Digbena jactis Extractæ (1652);—Questiones Theologicæ, etc. (1653);—Contemplation of Heaven, etc. (1654);—The Grounds of Obedience and Government (1655);—Religion and Reason Mutually Corresponding and Assisting Each Other (1659);—The Middle State of Souls from the Hour of Death to the Day of Judgment (eod.). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

White, William, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal bishop, was born in Philadelphia, March 26, 1748. He passed A.B. at Philadelphia College in 1765, and was soon after ordained in England. On his return to America in 1772, he became associate minister of Christ Church and St. Peter's, Philadelphia, where he continued till the Revolution. In 1777 he was chaplain to Congress and was elected rector of Christ and St. Peter's churches in Philadelphia. He was consecrated bishop at London in 1787, and died July 17, 1836. Exclusive of periodicals, he published, The Case of the Episcopal Churches in the United States (1782);—Thoughts on the Singing of Psalms, etc., signed "Silas" (1808);—Lectures on the Catechism of the P. E. Church, with Supplementary Lectures, etc. (1813, 2 vols. 8vo);—Comparative Views of the Controversy between the Calvinists and the Arminians, etc. (1817, 2 vols. 8vo);—Memoirs of the P. E. Church in the United States (1820, 8vo);—A Commentary on Ordination, etc. (1833, 8vo);—An Essay:—and several Addresses, Letters, and Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 280.

Whitefield, George, a pre-eminent evangelist and founder of the Calvinistic branch of the Methodists, was a native of Gloucester, England, in the Bell Inn of which town (his father being a tavern-keeper) he was born, Dec. 16, 1714. His father having died while George was yet young, the boy's education devolved solely on his mother, whose pious instructions and example had a powerful influence in imbuing his infant mind with strong religious impressions. Having resolved to cultivate the superior talents with which she saw George was endowed, she sent him to a classical school. At the age of fifteen he had distinguished himself by the accuracy and extent of his knowledge, and by his taste in Greek and Roman literature. But his mother not succeeding in the hotel, and becoming reduced to poverty, the progress of George's education was stopped, and, being driven to undertake some menial place about the establishment, his manners and morals were much injured by his association with irreligious servants. Happily his religious impressions revived, and, having been confirmed, he received for the first time the sacrament of the Lord's supper. His mother's circumstances improving, she sent him to Pembroke College, Oxford, and there he joined in forming a small select society for mutual improvement in religious knowledge and personal piety, along with the Wesleys and a few college contemporaries of kindred spirit. Dr. Benson, bishop of Gloucester, who was acquainted with his rare talents and piety, resolved to grant him ordination, and the solemn ceremony was performed at Gloucester on June 20, 1736. His first sermon, preached on the following Sabbath, produced an extraordinary sensation. From Gloucester he went to London, where he preached alternately in the chapel of the Tower and at Ludgate Prison every Tuesday. In 1737 he joined his friends the Wesleys as a missionary at the Georgian settlement; but he had only been four months resident there, when he returned to England both to obtain priest's orders and to raise subscriptions for erecting an orphan-house in that settlement. On his arrival in London, he found an outcry raised against him on account of Methodism. Bishop Benson disregarded it and ordained him a priest. But he was denied access to the pulpits of many old friends; and hence he commenced the practice of open-air preaching in Moorfields, Kennington, Blackheath, and other quarters, where his ministrations were attended by vast crowds. Having raised a fund of £1000 for his orphanage, Whitefield returned in 1739 to the American continent. At Savannah immense crowds repaired to hear him, and extraordinary scenes of excitement were enacted. On March 25, 1740, he laid the first brick of the orphan-asylum; and when the building was completed, he gave it the name of Bethesda. Although his ministry was very successful at Savannah, he sighed for his native land; and accordingly, in 1741, he returned once more to Britain, where he continued with indefatigable diligence to preach the Gospel. In prosecution of that object, he made a tour through England, Wales, and Scotland, preaching in many places, and always in the open air, to immense crowds. While in Wales, he married Mrs. Jones, a widow to whom he had long cherished a warm attachment; and shortly after his marriage he repaired to London, where, it being winter, some of his admirers erected a wooden shed in which he preached, and which he called the Tabernacle. He was under the patronage of the countess-dowager of Huntingdon, to whom he was chaplain, and whose benevolence he shared especially in the support of the community of which he was the head. At the death of that lady, her place was filled by lady Erskine.

In the beginning of August, 1744, Mr. Whitefield, though in an infirm state of health, embarked again for America. At New York he was taken exceedingly ill, and his death was apprehended; but he gradually recovered and resumed his arduous and important duties. He was still very much inconvenienced with pains in his side, for which he was advised to go to the Bermudas. Landing there on March 15, 1748, he met with the kindest reception, and traversed the island from one end to the other, preaching twice every day. His congregations were large, he there collected upwards of £100 for his orphan-school; but as he feared a relapse in his disorder if he returned to America, he took passage in a brig, and arrived in safety at Deal, and the next evening set off for London, after an absence of four years.

On the return of Mr. Whitefield, he found his congregation at the Tabernacle very much scattered, and his own pecuniary circumstances declining, all his household furniture having been sold to pay the orphan-house debt. His congregation now, however, began to contribute, and his debt was slowly liquidating. At this time lady Huntingdon sent for him to preach at her house to several of the nobility, who desired to hear him; among whom was the earl of Chesterfield, who expressed himself highly gratified; and lord Bolingbroke told him he had done great justice to the divine attributes in his discourse. In September he visited Scotland a third time and was joyfully received. His thoughts were now wholly engaged in a plan for making his orphan-house (which was at first only intended for the fatherless) a seminary of literature and academical learning. In February, 1749, he made an excursion to Exeter and Plymouth, where he was received with enthusiasm, and in the same year he returned to London, having travelled about six hundred miles in the west of England; and in May he went to Portsmouth and Portsea, at which places he was eminently useful; many at that time, by the instrumentality of his preaching, being "turned from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God." In September he went to Northampton and Yorkshire, where he preached to congregations of ten thousand people, who were peaceable and attentive; and only in one or two places was he treated with unkindness. In 1751 Mr. Whitefield visited Ireland, and was gladly received at Dublin; his labors there were, as usual, very useful. From Ireland he proceeded to Scotland, where he also met with great encouragement to proceed in his indefatigable work. On Aug. 6 he set out from Edinburgh for London, in order to embark for America. On Oct. 27 he arrived at Savannah, and found the orphan-school in a flourishing condition. Having suffered formerly from the climate, he determined not to spend the summer in America, but re-embarked for London, where he arrived in safety.

His active mind, ever forming some new plan for the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom, now turned towards the erection of a new tabernacle. The foundation was laid March 1, 1753, and was opened on Sunday, June 10, 1754. After preaching in it a few days, he again left England for Scotland, embracing every opportunity of preaching on his road till he arrived at Edinburgh; and after travelling twelve hundred miles, he returned home on Nov. 25, and opened the Tabernacle at Bristol, after which he returned to London, and in September, 1756, opened his new chapel in Tottenham Court Road. His labors were immense. He preached fifteen times a week; hundreds of persons went away from the chapel without being able to gain admittance. By his unremitting attention to his congregation, at the two chapels in London, his strength was much reduced. About the end of the year, finding his health improved, he, however, determined on again visiting America. Towards the end of November he left England, and arrived at Boston the beginning of January. After spending the winter pleasantly and usefully in America, he once more embarked for his native shores and landed in England, and on Oct. 6, 1765, opened the countess of Huntingdon's chapel at Bath. Shortly after his arrival in London, Mrs. Whitefield was seized with an inflammatory fever, and became its victim on Aug. 9; and on the 14th he delivered her funeral sermon, which was distinguished for its pathos, as well as for its manly and pious eloquence.

He now prepared for his seventh and last voyage to America, where he arrived in safety on Nov. 30; but his sphere of activity was fast drawing to a close. His complaint, which was asthma, made rapid inroads upon his constitution, and, though it had several times threatened his dissolution, it was at last sudden and unexpected. From Sept. 17 to the 20th this faithful laborer in the vineyard of Christ preached daily at Boston; and, though much indisposed, proceeded from thence on the 21st, and continued his work until the 29th, when he delivered a discourse at Exeter, N. H., in the open air for two hours; notwithstanding which, he set off for Newburyport, where he arrived that evening, intending to preach the next morning. His rest was much disturbed, and he complained of a great oppression at his lungs; and at five o'clock on Sabbath morning, Sept. 30, 1770, at the age of only fifty-six, he entered into the rest prepared for the people of God. According to his own desire, Mr. Whitefield was interred at Newburyport. He and Wesley, though one in heart, were divided in their theological opinions, and hence in the early part of their career their paths diverged. The friendship existing between them was not of an ephemeral character, but remained steadfast to the end. Wesley preached a funeral discourse commemorative of his virtues and usefulness.

Mr. Whitefield was not a learned man, like his contemporary, Wesley; but he possessed an unusual share of good sense, general information, knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and an accurate acquaintance with the human heart. Few ministers have been equally useful since the days of the apostles. The sermons of Mr. Whitefield were impassioned, and generally addressed to the hearts of his congregations. He was benevolent and kind, forgiving and gentle; but he was zealous and firm, and seldom allowed his feelings to overcome his judgment. He was eminently useful in having excited a greater degree of attention to religion; and millions have doubtless blessed his name, as tens of thousands revere his memory.

Whitefield was no common preacher. Parties of the most opposite character and principles, such as Franklin, Hume, and John Newton, have united in bearing testimony to the beauty and effectiveness of Whitefield's pulpit oratory. Dr. James Hamilton, of London, describing Whitefield, said, "He was the prince of English preachers. Many have surpassed him in making sermons, but none have approached him as a pulpit orator. Many have outshone him in the clearness of their logic, the grandeur of their conceptions, and the sparkling beauty of single sentences; but in the power of darting the Gospel direct into the conscience, he eclipsed them all. With a full and beaming countenance, and the frank and easy port which the English people love, he combined a voice of rich compass, which could equally thrill over Moorfields in musical thunder or whisper its terrible secret in every private ear; and to his gainly aspect and tuneful voice he added a most expressive and eloquent action. None ever used so boldly, nor with more success, the higher styles of impersonation. His thoughts were possessions and his feelings were transformations; and if he spoke because he felt, his hearers understood because they saw. They were not only enthusiastic amateurs, like Garrick, who ran to weep and tremble at his bursts of passion, but even the colder critics of the Walpole school were surprised into momentary sympathy and reluctant wonder. Lord Chesterfield was listening in lady Huntingdon's pew when he described the sinner under the character of a blind beggar led by a little dog. The dog escapes, from some cause, and he was left to grope his way guided only by his staff. Unconsciously he wanders to the edge of a precipice; his staff drops from his hand, down the abyss too far to send back an echo; he reaches forward cautiously to recover it; for a moment he poises on vacancy, and—'Good God!' shouted Chesterfield, 'he is gone,' as he sprang from his seat to prevent the catastrophe. But the glory of Whitefield's preaching was its heart-kindled and heart-melting Gospel. Without this all his bold strokes and brilliant impersonations would have been no better than the rhetorical triumphs of many pulpit dramatists. He was an orator, but he only sought to be an evangelist. Like a volcano where gold and gems may be ejected as well as common things, but where gold and molten granite flow all alike in fiery fusion, bright thoughts and splendid images might be projected from his pulpit, but all were merged in the stream that bore along the Gospel and himself in blended fervor. Indeed, so simple was his nature that glory to God and good-will to man had filled it, and there was room for little more. Having no Church to found, no family to enrich, and no memory to immortalize, he was simply the ambassador of God, and inspired with its genial, piteous spirit—so full of heaven reconciled and humanity restored—he soon himself became a living Gospel. . . . Coming to his work direct from communion with his Master, and in the strength of accepted prayer, there was an elevation in his mien which often paralyzed hostility, and a self-possession which made him, amid uproar and confusion, the more sublime. With an electric bolt he would bring the jester in his fool's-cap from his perch on the tree, or galvanize the brick-bat from the skulking miscreant's grasp, or sweep down in crouching submission and shame-faced silence the whole of Bartholomew Fair; while a revealing flash of sententious doctrine, of vivified Scripture, would disclose to awe-struck hundreds the forgotten verities of another world or the unsuspected arcana of the inner man. 'I came to break your head, but through you God has broken my heart' was a sort of confession with which he was familiar; and to see the deaf old gentlewoman, who used to utter imprecations on him as he passed along the street, clambering up the pulpit stairs to catch his angelic words, was a sort of spectacle which the triumphant Gospel often witnessed in his day. When it is known that his voice could be heard by twenty thousand, and that ranging all the empire, as well as America, he would often preach thrice on a working day, and that he has received in one week as many as a thousand letters from persons awakened by his sermons—if no estimate can be formed of the results of his ministry, some idea may be suggested of its vast extent and singular effectiveness."

Whitefield published a number of sermons, journals, etc., and his entire works were printed in London in 1771-72 (7 vols. 8vo.), including a Life by Gillies. For other literature, see Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v. The best biography is by Tyerman, Life of George Whitefield (Lond. 1876, 2 vols. 8vo.).

Whitehouse, HENRY JOHN, D.D., D.C.L., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in New York city in August, 1803. He graduated at Columbia College in 1821, and at the General Theological Seminary (Episcopal) in 1824; was ordained deacon the same year, and priest in 1827; was rector of St. Luke's Church, Rochester, from 1829 to 1844, and of St. Thomas's, New York, from 1844 to 1851; was consecrated assistant bishop of Illinois, Nov. 20, 1851; was chosen to succeed bishop Chase in that diocese at the death of the latter in 1852; preached the sermon before the Pan-Anglican Council, London, in 1867, and died Aug. 10, 1874. His only publications are in the form of Sermons, Addresses, etc.

Whitgift, JOHN, D.D., an eminent English prelate, was born at Great Grimsby, Lincolnshire, in 1530. He was educated at Queen's College, and Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1554; was chosen fellow of Peterhouse in 1555; entered into holy orders in 1560, and was appointed chaplain to Cox, bishop of Ely, who gave him the rectory of Feversham, in Cambridgeshire; was appointed lady Margaret professor of divinity at Cambridge in 1563; became chaplain to the queen in 1565; was president of Peterhouse in 1567; became master of Pembroke Hall in April of the same year; was appointed regius professor of divinity, and yet the same year became master of Trinity College; became prebendary of Ely in 1568; vice-chancellor of the University of Cambridge in 1570; dean of Lincoln in 1571; prebendary of Lincoln in 1572; bishop of Worcester, and vice-president of the Marches of Wales in 1577; was chosen the successor of Edmund Grindal as archbishop of Canterbury in 1583; was very severe in his prosecution of Nonconformists, both Puritans and Catholics, and was noted for his strenuous advocacy of the constitution of the English Church; obtained a decree against liberty of printing in 1585; became privy-councillor in 1586; founded a hospital and grammar-school at Croydon in 1595; joined in the deliberations of the conferences at Hampton Court in January, 1604; and died at Lambeth Palace, Feb. 29, of the same year. The Works of John Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury (Cambridge, 1851-54, 3 vols.), were edited for the Parker Society by the Rev. John Ayre. Biographies have been written by Sir George Paule (1612) and John Strype (1718).

Whiton, JOHN MILTON, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Winchendon, Mass., Aug. 1, 1785. He graduated at Yale College in 1805; taught an academic school in Litchfield, Conn., for one year; studied theology privately; was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Antrim, N. H., Sept. 28, 1808; resigned Jan. 1, 1853, and became acting pastor of a Congregational Church in Bennington, N. H., where he continued till his death, Sept. 28, 1856. He published several single sermons, and contributed Brief Notices of the Town of Antrim to the New Hampshire Hist. Coll. iv. 216-224, and to the Repository an Account of the Min- isters of Hillsborough, N. H. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 113, note; Aliboune, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Whittaker, JOHN WILLIAM, D.D., an English divine, was born at Manchester in 1790. He was educated at St. John's College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow; was made vicar of St. Mary's, Blackburn, and in 1852 honorary canon of Manchester. He died Aug. 3, 1854. He published, An Historical and Critical Enquiry into the Interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures (1819):—Supplement to the same (1820):—Justification by Faith: Five Sermons, etc. (1825):—The Catholic Church: Five Sermons (1835):—and other sermons and papers.

Whittemore, THOMAS, D.D., an American Universalist minister, was born in Boston in 1800. He was apprenticed successively as a morocco-dresser, brass-founder, and boot-maker; studied theology, and in April, 1821, was settled as pastor of the Church at Milford, Mass.; removed to a Church at Cambridgeport in 1822; resigned this pastorate in 1831, but remained in Cambridge the rest of his life; was joint editor of the Universalist Magazine; established The Trumpet, a Universalist newspaper, in 1828, and was sole editor and proprietor of it for thirty years; was a member of the Massachusetts Legislature, president of the Cambridge bank, and president of the Vermont and Massachusetts Railroad, and died in Cambridge, March 21, 1861. He was the author of, Modern History of Universalism (1830):—A Commentary on the Revelation of St. John (1838):—Commentary on the Book of Daniel:—Plain Guide to Universalism (1840):—Autobiography (1859):—and other works.

Whittingham, WILLIAM ROLLINSON, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in New York city, Dec. 2, 1805. He graduated in 1825 from the General Theological Seminary in New York city, and was ordained two years later. St. Mark's, Orange, N. J., was his first pastoral charge, which he held from 1828 for a year and a half. In 1831 he became rector of St. Luke's parish, New York city. While there his health failed, and he made a trip to Italy, returning much benefited. In 1835 he was elected to the chair of ecclesiastical history in the General Theological Seminary. In 1846 he was elected bishop of Maryland, and was consecrated in Baltimore, Sept. 17 of that year. He died at West Orange, N. J., Oct. 17, 1879. The Parish Library, 13 vols., was edited by him, and he was also editor of The Churchman, a well-known Episcopal periodical. The Family Visitor and Children's Magazine were also under his editorial supervision. Bishop Whittingham's library was considered one of the finest collections in America. See Amer. Church Rev. xxxi, 476.

Whitlesey, WILLIAM, archbishop of Canterbury, is supposed to have been a native of Whitlesey, a town situated in the County of Cambridge, and received his education at the University of Cambridge. In 1349 he became master custos of his college, the third in succession from the founder. In 1361 William Whitlesey was consecrated to the see of Rochester, and on Oct. 11, 1368, he found himself primate of all England and metropolitan by order of the pope. It seems that he was neither physically nor intellectually adequate to the exigencies of his position or the requirements of the time. His government was weak. The condition of the Church troubled him greatly. He felt deeply his incapacity to take his proper place in the country. However, to Whitlesey belongs the merit of having put an end to the disputes which frequently arose between the University of Oxford and the bishop of Lincoln. He died in June, 1374. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, iv, 221 sq.

Wilberforce, Samuel, D.D., an English prelate, son of William Wilberforce, was born at Clapham, Sept. 7, 1805. He graduated at Oriol College, Oxford, in 1826; became curate of Chickenden, Oxfordshire, in 1828; rector of Brixton (Brightstone), Isle of Wight, in 1830; select preacher before the University of Oxford in 1837; rector of Alverstoke, Hants, archdeacon of Surrey, and chaplain to prince Albert, all in 1839; canon of Winchester Cathedral in 1840; sub-almoner to the queen in 1844; dean of Westminster and select preacher before the University of Oxford in 1845; bishop of Oxford, to which is attached the office of chancellor of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, in November of the same year; lord high almoner to the queen in November, 1847, and bishop of Winchester in October, 1869. He was killed by a fall from his horse while riding near Dorking, July 19, 1873. He was one of the ablest debaters in the House of Lords, and for his versatility of opinions was known as "Slippery Sam." He was very popular in the highest society, was a leader of the High-Church party, but an opponent of Ritualism. He was the author of, Note Book of a Country Clergyman (1833):—Eucharistica (1839):—History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America (1844):—Heroes of Hebrew History (1870):—and many other miscellaneous works, including sermons, charges, stories, etc.

Wilberforce, William, an English philanthropist, was born at Hull, Aug. 24, 1759. His father was a merchant of that city, descended from the ancient Yorkshire family of Wilberfoss. He first attended the grammar-school at Hull; but on the death of his father, in 1768, he was transferred to the care of his uncle, who placed him in a school at Wimbledon. While at this school his aunt, who was an ardent admirer of Whitefield's preaching, first led him to the contemplation of the truths of religion; but, at the same time, impressed upon him her peculiar views. His mother, fearing lest he should become a Methodist, removed him from the care of his uncle and placed him in the Pocklington Grammar-school, in Yorkshire, where his serious impressions were soon dissipated in a life of ease and gayety. In October, 1776, he entered St. John's College, Cambridge, being only seventeen years of age. He graduated in 1781, and almost immediately thereafter was elected member of Parliament from Hull. He now came to London, and entered at once into the first society. He was elected a member of the most fashionable clubs, and became intimate with the leading wits and politicians of the day. He had formed an intimacy with Pitt while at Cambridge which now became still closer. In Parliament he took but little part in the debates, but was generally opposed to Lord North's administration, and particularly adverse to the American War. In 1784, while delivering an address before the freeholders of York, they suddenly decided to have him for their representative, and he was returned to Parliament from this the largest county in England. He made a tour on the Continent during 1784-85 with Mr. Pitt and the Rev. Isaac Milner, whose influence, coupled with the reading of the New Test. and Doddridge's Rise and Progress, awakened in him those serious impressions which had been implanted by his aunt at Wimbledon, and fixed in him the determination to devote his life to God and humanity. On his return to England he began to devote himself to all reforms which opportunity permitted. But in 1787 he began a series of efforts for the reformation of manners, the suppression of vice and immorality, and especially for the abolition of the African slave-trade. He opened the debate against the traffic in May, 1789, and, during all the period that followed until the accomplishment of this great result, never lost sight of the one object of his public career. He continued to represent York until 1812, from which time until 1825 he was representative from Bramber. From the English Cyclopædia (Biog. Div. vi, 600, 601) we quote the account of his efforts against the slave-traffic:

"Relying more upon the humane and religious feelings of the country than upon parliamentary support, he availed himself of the agency of a society of which Granville Sharp was the president, and Thomas Clarkson the agent. Throughout the struggle, which lasted twenty years, Mr. Wilberforce was indefatigable. Year after year his hopes were deferred. Thwarted at one time by the protracted examination of witnesses, outvoted at others, now in the Commons, now in the Lords, he never flinched from a renewal of the contest. In Parliament he supported his cause by many admirable speeches, and by a diligent collection and sifting of evidence. Out of Parliament he never lost sight of the same great object. In his conversation and his letters he conciliated the support of all parties. Cabinet ministers, opposition members, the clergy of all shades of opinion, and his own familiar friends were alike solicited to advance the cause of abolition. . . .

"Apart from the opposition which he encountered from the West India interest, the fearful excesses of the French Revolution and the rebellion of the slaves in St. Domingo led many to associate the abolition of the slave-trade with the frantic schemes of the Jacobins. For seven years this cause alone retarded the success of his endeavors. Meanwhile, though well fitted morally for the labors he had undertaken, it is marvellous how his weakly constitution enabled him to bear up against the bodily fatigues which he was forced to endure. In the spring of 1788, when his labors were yet to come, his health appeared entirely to fail from an absolute decay of the digestive organs. The first physicians, after a consultation, declared to his family 'that he had not stamina to last a fortnight'; and, although he happily recovered from his illness, we find him exclaiming on New-year's-day, 1790, 'At thirty and a half I am in constitution sixty.' From his infancy he had suffered much from weak eyes, and his exertions were constantly interrupted or rendered painful by this infirmity. Still, rising with new hopes and vigor from every disappointment, he confidently relied upon ultimate success. At length the hour of triumph was at hand. In January, 1807, he published a book against the slave-trade, at the very moment that question was about to be discussed in the House of Lords. The Abolition Bill passed the Lords, and its passage through the Commons was one continued triumph to its author. Sir Samuel Romilly concluded an affecting speech in favor of the bill 'by contrasting the feelings of Napoleon, in all his greatness, with those of that honored individual who would this day lay his head upon his pillow and remember that the slave-trade was no more;' when the whole House, we are told, burst forth in acclamations of applause, and greeted Mr. Wilberforce with three cheers."

During this whole period he had been actively engaged in all the great questions of the times. He sacrificed friendship to the cause of truth and humanity, and never suffered an opportunity to escape for doing good. His great task, however, was the agitation of negro-emancipation, which he continued until his retirement in 1825. The emancipation act passed just before his death. "Thank God," he exclaimed, "that I should have lived to witness a day in which England is willing to give twenty millions sterling for the abolition of slavery!" He died at Cadogan Place, London, July 29, 1833, and was buried in Westminster Abbey with all the honors of a public funeral. His most important literary works are, Speech in the House of Commons on the Abolition of the Slave-trade (1789);—Practical View of the Prevailing Religious Systems of Professed Christians in the Higher and Middle Classes in this Country Contrasted with Real Christianity (1797);—Apology for the Christian Sabbath (1799);—Letter on the Abolition of the Slave-trade, Addressed to the Freeholders and other Inhabitants of Yorkshire (1807);—and others on philanthropic and religious subjects. Wilbrord (or Willbrod), St., commonly known as "The Apostle to the Frisians," was born in the Saxon kingdom of Northumbria about A.D. 657. He was placed in Wilfred's monastery at Ripon while still a child, and adopted the monastic profession before he was twenty years old. He then visited Ireland, where he spent thirteen years under the instruction of St. Egbert and the monk Wigbert, two members of the Anglo-Irish Church, the latter of whom had preached Christianity in Friesland for two years in vain. Having determined to undertake the work which had baffled his preceptor, Wilbrord departed for Friesland in the year 690, taking with him eleven or twelve disciples. When they arrived at Utrecht, they were warmly received by Pepin the Big, who had just gained a victory over the Frisians. In 692 he visited Rome to gain the favor and influence of the pope, and in 695 made a second visit to the papal capital, and was made bishop of the Frisians with the ecclesiastical name of Clemens. He established his episcopal chair at Utrecht, where he built the Church of St. Saviour, and restored that of St. Martin. He visited the Danes and made many converts; then, proceeding by water, he came to the island called Fositland (probably the present Heligoland), from the name of the idol worshipped there. Here his disregard of their superstitions and of the objects by them held sacred subjected him to great opposition and a severe ordeal, in which, however, he was successful in escaping punishment. His work was largely undone by the death of Pepin in 714, and the consequent restoration of the heathen monarch Radbod. But Wilbrord enjoyed the patronage of Charles Martel, whose successes re-established him in his episcopal authority and influence. He founded the monastery of Epternach, near Treves, about 698, and there died and was buried in 738. His day in the calendar is the 7th of November. See Bede, Historia Ecclesiastica, V, xi, xii; Mabillon, Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti, lib. xviii; Wright, Biographia Britannica Literaria (Anglo-Saxon Period), p. 250-262; Hoefer, *Nouv. Biog. Wiley, Allen, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal divine, was born in Frederick County, Va., Jan. 15, 1789. He removed to Indiana with his parents in 1804; was brought into the Church under the ministry of Rev. Moses Crume in 1810; licensed to exhort Sept. 10, 1811, and to preach July 10, 1813, and was admitted on trial in the Ohio Conference in 1817. "The commencement of his itinerancy was the beginning of a career of great and permanent usefulness." Eleven years he spent in traveling extensive circuits; for fourteen years he acted as presiding elder, and for five years he was stationed in the principal large towns. He was chosen delegate to each General Conference from 1832 to 1844. He died at Vevay, Ind., July 23, 1848. Dr. Wiley was a man of God, mighty in the Scriptures, able and successful as a minister. For a number of years he read the Scriptures in the Hebrew, Latin, and Greek languages. "He was one of the active founders and patrons of the Indiana Asbury University, and held for many years the position of trustee. He wrote for the Western Christian Advocate a number of articles on 'Ministerial Character and Duties,' which were subsequently collected and published in a separate work, and are now contained in the account of his Life and Times, written by Dr. F. C. Holliday." See Minutes of Annual Conferences, iv, 295; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 569. (J. L. S.)

Wiley, Charles, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Flatbush, L. I., May 30, 1810. He was the second son of Charles Wiley, bookseller and publisher in New York city. After the usual school preparation, he entered Columbia College in 1825, and remained as a student there until the death of his father, in 1826. He then entered the law-office of Griffen and Strong, a well-known law firm in Wall Street, and pursued the study of the law with ardor and much promise of success. During the religious revival of 1828-29 he joined Dr. Joel Parker's Church, and resolved to become a minister of the Gospel. In 1831 he entered Princeton College, and in 1832 went to the Theological Seminary at Auburn, N. Y., graduating in 1835 after a full course of three years. He became a resident licentiate there, and after spending a short time at New Haven, Conn., was in 1837 ordained and installed as pastor of the Congregational Church at Northampton, Mass., where he remained eight years. In 1845 he was installed over the Reformed Dutch Church at Utica, N. Y., where he remained until 1855. In that year he was appointed president of Milwaukee University, and held that position for several years; but the financial crisis of 1857 made it impossible for that institution to sustain competition with others earlier in the field, and the effort to build it up was discontinued. In 1858 he supplied the Presbyterian Church at Lafayette, Ind., and was rector of the high-school there. In 1859 he supplied the Congregational Church at Birmingham, Conn. In 1860 he was settled over the Reformed Dutch Church at Geneva, N. Y., where he preached until 1866, when he removed to Hackensack, N. J., and engaged in teaching a private school. In 1871 he removed to Orange, and up to the period of his fatal illness was engaged in that region in conducting a private school, and in editing some text-books of Virgil and Cæsar for school use. Dr. Wiley was a fine classical scholar. His death occurred Dec. 21, 1878, at East Orange, N. J. (W. P. S.)

Wilfrid (WILFERDER), Saint, is the name of four English bishops.

1. Bishop of YORK (which was no longer an archbishopric after the death of Paulinus; see Fuller, Church Hist. of Britain, i, 217). This celebrated man was born of noble parents in Northumberland, in A.D. 634. Having lost his mother in his fourteenth year, he entered a Scottish convent on the island of Lindisfarne, but afterwards resolved to study the Church and monasticism at Rome. He went thither by way of Canterbury and Lyons, and arrived in 654. From 655 to 658 he was at Lyons, and there received the tonsure at the hands of his friend, the archbishop Dalin. He returned to England, and gained the favor of Oswy, king of Northumberland, being made tutor to the prince Alchfrid (664) and receiving the abbey of Inrhypum (Ripon). At this time a synod was assembled at Streneshale (Whitby, in Yorkshire) to discuss the Easter and the tonsure controversies, and Wilfrid succeeded in determining it to approve the usages of Rome, in consequence of which he was appointed in 665 to the then vacant see of York, and sent to archbishop Agilbert of Paris for consecration. During his absence, Ceadda (St. Chad) was ordained bishop of York at Canterbury, and Wilfrid therefore retired to his monastery of Ripon until archbishop Theodore transferred Ceadda to Mercia (Lichfield) and restored York to Wilfrid, after which he exercised jurisdiction over the whole of Northumberland. He lost the royal favor, however, in 673, by assisting queen Ethelreda to take the veil, and he was thereupon deposed and his diocese divided into three parts. He appealed to the pope, and started for Rome to plead his own cause in A.D. 678; and being driven out of his course by a storm, he carried the Gospel to the Frisians, converted many, and baptized their king, Aldegils. On his arrival at Rome, pope Agatho restored him to his bishopric, but directed that the more distant parts of his see should be erected into separate dioceses. King Egfrid threw him into prison, however, on his return to England, regardless of the justification of his cause pronounced by the pope; and he was eventually obliged to seek an asylum among the heathen people of Sussex. This banishment was utilized, however, for successful missionary labors. King Edilwalch received baptism, and evangelists were sent to the Isle of Wight (Wight), who labored with gratifying success. In 686, Alchfrid, Wilfrid's former pupil, having obtained the crown, the exiled bishop was recalled, but again deposed in 692 on a charge of disobedience to the authority of Canterbury. He once more appealed to the pope from his banishment in Mercia, and at the age of seventy years undertook a journey to Rome that he might obtain justice (703 or 704). The conclave decided that Wilfrid's opponents were base calumniators, and instructed the king to restore him to his see. While returning through Gaul, Wilfrid fell sick (705), and had a vision in which the angel Gabriel revealed that the prayers of Wilfrid's pupils had obtained for him restoration to health, the recovery of part of his diocese, and four years of life. The king refused, on his arrival in England, to obey the papal order, but died soon afterwards, and his successor, Osred, restored the see. Wilfrid died, "after four years," Oct. 12, 709, having held the bishopric during forty-four years. His remains were interred at Ripon, but ultimately at Canterbury. His importance, aside from his missionary character, lies in his association with Theodore of Canterbury as principal supporter of the papal authority and Romish customs in England. The following writings are attributed to him, but without full proof of authenticity: De Catholico Celebrando Paschali Ritū:—De Regulis Monachorum, etc. See Heddus, Vita Wilfridi; Bede, Hist. Eccles. iii-v, ed. Stevenson; Roger de Wendover, Chronica sive Flores Historiarum, vol. i, ed. Coxe; Lingard, Hist. of England, 5th ed. i, 122 sq.; William of Malmesbury, De Gest. Pontif. iii, 152; id. De Gest. Reg. i, 3; Godwin, De Præsul. Angl. p. 654; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

2. Bishop of BEVERLY and archbishop of York (Wilfridus Junior), a contemporary of Bede (Hist. Eccles. v, 23; see also Roger de Wendover, ut sup. i, 213, 227; and Sachsenchronik).

3. Bishop of WORCESTER at the beginning of the 8th century. See Anglia Sacra, i, 470; Roger de Wendover, ut sup. i, 205; Bede, Hist. Eccles. v, 23.

4. Archbishop of CANTERBURY, 806 et seq., died 829 or 832. See Roger de Wendover, ut sup. i, 270; also Sachsenchronik.

Wilkie, WILLIAM, D.D., a Scotch clergyman and poet, was born at Echlin, Linlithgowshire, in 1721. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, where he had entered at the age of thirteen, but was compelled to leave that institution before completing the course on account of the death of his father; turned his attention to farming, where he continued his studies, and took orders in the Church of Scotland; published The Epigoniad, a Poem in Nine Books, in 1757, which gained for him the title of "the Scottish Homer;" printed a new edition of this work, accompanied by A Dream in the Manner of Spenser, in 1759; was chosen professor of natural philosophy at St. Andrew's the same year; published a volume of Moral Fables in verse in 1768; and died Oct. 10, 1772.

Wilkins, David, D.D., a learned English divine, was born in 1685. He was appointed keeper of the archiepiscopal library at Lambeth in 1715; spent the next three years in drawing up a catalogue of that collection; became rector of Mongham-Parva, Kent, in 1716, and of Great Chart and Hadleigh in 1719; was constituted chaplain to the archbishop and collated to the rectories of Monks-Ely and Bocking; was appointed joint commissary of Bocking; became prebendary of Canterbury in 1720; was collated to the archdeaconry of Suffolk in May, 1724; and died Sept. 6, 1745. His principal publications are, Novum Testamentum Ægyptiacum, vulgo Copticum, etc. (1716):—Leges Anglo-Saxonice Ecclesiasticæ et Civiles, etc. (1721):—Quinque Libri Moysis Prophetæ in Lingua Ægyptiaca, etc. (1731):—et Concilia Magnæ Britannicæ et Hiberniæ (1736-37). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Wilkins, Isaac, D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Witherwood, in the island of Jamaica, Dec. 17, 1742. His father, Martin Wilkins, became a judge in Jamaica, and was an eminent lawyer. Isaac was an only son, and when about six years of age was brought to New York city to obtain better educational facilities than the West Indies afforded. In 1760 he graduated at Columbia College. What he saved from his father's estate in Jamaica enabled him to purchase Castle Hill Neck, in Westchester County. After his graduation he resided for some time upon this farm, and occupied himself in cultivating it. In 1772 he was sent to the Colonial Legislature, and until April 18, 1775, he was an active member of that body, ready in debate and honest in the service of his country. He was the reputed author of several political pamphlets which were obnoxious to the Whigs, and eventually it was necessary for him to leave America: and published, before sailing for England, an address to his countrymen, in which he endeavored to vindicate himself as a lover of his country. He remained in England about a year, in which time it is asserted that he endeavored to accommodate the dispute between Great Britain and the colonies. Having returned to his family at Castle Hill, which had been laid waste, he was compelled to retreat with them to Long Island. At Newtown and Flatbush he made his residence until peace was declared. His farm had not been confiscated; so he sold it in 1784, took his family to Shelburne, N. S., purchased property there, and again became a farmer. Soon after he was a member of the Assembly in that province. In 1798 he returned to New York and prepared for the ministry, and took charge of St. Peter's Church at Westchester, of which, as soon as he was ordained deacon, he became rector. On Jan. 14, 1801, he was ordained priest. The British government, in consideration of his services during the Revolution, bestowed upon him an annuity of £120 for life, and for thirty-one years he was rector of St. Peter's. He died in Westchester, N. Y., Feb. 5, 1830. His sermons were concise and forcible; his delivery was natural and effective. As a rule, his discourses were short and impressive. A number of poetic effusions of some merit are extant of which he was the author. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 462.

Wilkins, John, D.D., an ingenious and learned English bishop, was born at Fawsley, near Daventry, Northamptonshire, in 1614. He was educated at All-Saints', at New Inn Hall, and at Magdalen Hall, Oxford; took holy orders; became chaplain, first to William, lord Say, and then to Charles, count Palatine of the Rhine; took sides with the Parliament under Cromwell, and took the Solemn League and Covenant; was made warden of Wadham College in 1648; became master of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1659; ejected at the Restoration the following year; became preacher to the honorable society of Gray's Inn and rector of St. Lawrence Jewry, London; was chosen a member of the Royal Society; was made dean of Ripon; became bishop of Chester in 1668; and died at the house of Dr. Tillotson, in Chancery Lane, London, Nov. 19, 1672. He published several mathematical and philosophical works, and the following, viz., Ecclesiastes, or a Discourse concerning the Gift of Preaching as it Falls under the Rules of Art (1646; best ed. 1778):—Discourse concerning the Beauty of Providence in all the Rugged Passages of It (1649):—Sermons, etc. (1675):—Of the Principles and Duties of Natural Religion (cod.).

Wilkinson, Henry (1), D.D., an English clergyman, son of one of the same name, and known as "Long Harry," was born at Waddesdon, Buckinghamshire, in 1609. He entered as commoner in Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in 1622, where he made great proficiency in his studies, became a noted tutor, master of the schools, and divinity reader; took orders in the Church of England about 1638, but was suspended from preaching because of views advanced in a sermon at St. Mary's in September, 1640; was restored by the Long Parliament; removed to London, where he was made minister of St. Faith's, under St. Paul's, and appointed one of the Assembly of Divines; became rector of St. Dunstan's-in-the-West in 1645; was appointed one of the six ministers to go to Oxford to establish Presbyterian forms and practices; became fellow of Magdalen College, a canon of Christ Church, and Margaret professor of divinity in 1652; was deprived at the Restoration; and died at Clapham in September, 1675. He published several Sermons preached before the Parliament. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Wilkinson, Henry (2), D.D., sometimes called Junior, but commonly known as "Dean Harry," an English clergyman, cousin of "Long Harry," was born at Adwick, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, in 1616. He began his education at a grammar-school in All-Saints' parish, Oxford; entered a commoner of Magdalen Hall in 1631, where he graduated, took holy orders, became a noted tutor, and moderator or dean of Magdalen Hall; left the university on account of his Puritan principles in 1642; removed to London, took the Covenant, and preached frequently; under the supremacy of Parliament he returned to Oxford, and became principal of Magdalen Hall and moral-philosophy reader; and suffered for Nonconformity after the Restoration while endeavoring to preach at Buckminster, Leicestershire; Gosfield, Essex; Sible-Headingham; and lastly at Connard, near Sudbury, Suffolk, where he died, May 13, 1690. He was the author of, Conciones Tres (1654):—Three Decades of Sermons (1660):—Catalogus Librorum in Bibliotheca Aulae Magdalenæ (1661):—Two Treatises (1681):—and other works.

Wilkinson, Sir John Gardner, D.C.L., F.R.S., a celebrated English traveller and Egyptologist, was born at Haxendale, Westmoreland, Oct. 5, 1797. He was the son of the Rev. John Wilkinson and a daughter of the Rev. Richard Gardner. He received his education at Harrow School and at Exeter College, Oxford. He afterwards went to Egypt, where he remained twelve years, devoting himself to the study of the antiquities of the country, and making himself acquainted with the languages, manners, and customs of the modern inhabitants. He resided a considerable time in a tomb at Thebes, and employed himself in making accurate surveys of the district and drawings of the superb architectural monuments, and in copying the sculptures, paintings, hieroglyphics, and other objects of interest then existing. In 1828 he published at Malta Materia Hieroglyphica, in four parts, and in 1835, in London, Topography of Thebes and General View of Egypt. In 1836 he began the publication of his great work, The Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians, printing the first series in 3 vols. 8vo—the second series, in 2 vols. 8vo, appearing in 1840. In 1843 he published Modern Egypt and Thebes, a new and condensed edition of which was published among Murray's Hand-books in 1847. In 1844 he travelled in Dalmatia and Montenegro, and in 1848 published Dalmatia and Montenegro, with a Journey to Mostar, in Herzegovina, and Remarks on the Slavonic Nations, etc. In 1850 he published The Architecture of Ancient Egypt, and in 1851 The Fragments of the Hieratic Papyrus at Turin containing the Names of the Egyptian Kings, etc. In 1855–56 he revisited Egypt, and on his return published Egypt in the Time of the Pharaohs. He presented his collections of Egyptian, Greek, and other antiquities to Harrow School for the purpose of forming a museum, to which he added, in 1874, his valuable collection of coins and medals. In 1858 he published A Treatise on Color and the General Diffusion of Taste among all Classes. He contributed many of the notes to Rawlinson's Herodotus, and published papers in the Transactions of the geographical and archaeological societies in Great Britain. He died Oct. 29, 1875. A Memoir was published by his widow in 1876. Lord Ripon, in an address before the Royal Society of Literature, spoke thus of his great work on the ancient Egyptians: "Indefatigable in research, full of learning, accurate in facts, Sir Gardner Wilkinson has at the same time treated his subject with the enthusiasm of genius and the liveliness of poetry. He opens to you the temple of their deities, the palace of their sovereign, the field of battle, and the repositories of the dead. He traces for you their early history, he exhibits to you their knowledge of the arts and sciences.

the course of their husbandry, and the process of their manufactures; and he introduces you to their private life with a graphic vivacity which makes you at once a judge of the virtues and vices of the Egyptian character, and a partaker, as it were, of the intimacies of their domestic society."

Will, ARMINIAN VIEW OF THE.—I. Definitions.—1. Mind is one and indivisible. For convenience in language, the phenomena of mind are generalized, and names given to the powers by which phenomena become possible and to which phenomena are referred. Those powers of mind which are immediately concerned in the acquisition, retention, and classification of knowledge are classed together and generalized so that the generic name of the intellect is made to include them all, or, more briefly, the mind's power to know is called the intellect. In like manner, the susceptibility of feeling is called the sensibility, and the power to put forth action is called the will. Not that there are three distinct entities, for evidently it is the same one and indivisible mind that perceives, judges, remembers, imagines, is pleased or displeased, loves or hates, chooses, resolves, determines, acts. Perhaps it would be quite as scientific as is the usual method of statement to say that mind, considered as an entity, is one, simple, indivisible, and ultimate; that the same one mind, considered as a power to know, is called the intellect; considered as a power of feeling, is called the sensibility; and considered as a power of action, is called the will.

2. Edwards defines will as "the power to choose." This is unscientific and inadequate, because there are evidently other phenomena of mind as distinctly active, and as clearly distinguished from knowledge and from feeling, as is choice.

Tappan's definition of will is "the mind's causality." This is not objectionable, unless it be said that it is too general and does not enable the thinker to form a definite conception.

Whedon says the will is "that power of the mind by which it becomes the conscious author of an intentional act." This is more specific, and is correct so far as it goes; but it may be asked, Is not will sometimes active when there is no intention or purpose cognized in consciousness? Does not the mind put forth acts of will unconsciously?

Haven says, "I understand by the will that power which the mind has of determining or deciding what it will do and of putting forth volitions accordingly."

Upham says "the will may properly enough be defined the mental power or susceptibility by which we put forth volitions." These are both defective, because they require a knowledge of what is meant by the term volitions.

Manifestly mind is so perfectly one, and its phenomena are so thoroughly interpenetrated, each and all being mutually conditioned one upon the other, that accurate and exhaustive definition is extremely difficult, if not impossible. In the present state of mental science, perhaps we say the best thing possible, and all that is requisite for practical purposes, when we say that to know, to feel, and to act is an exhaustive category of mental phenomena, and the mind's power to act is what is expressed by the term "the will."

3. In general use, all acts of will are called volitions. Some writers, however, distinguish them as "choices" and "volitions;" but no reason is apparent for varying from the general usage, as the distinction sought may be easily made when necessary by simply noting one class as volitions in choice, and the other as volitions in the executive nexus. To make a choice, to form a purpose, to seek an end, to indulge an intention, to resolve to do, with other terms of similar import, express acts of mind which are different from the mental nexus that moves the mind or body, or both, to do the thing intended. As between idleness and employment, as between one form of occupation and another, and as between several books lying before me, I determine to take up a particular book and give attention to the reading of the same, and the study of the topic on which it treats. These selections and the determination formed are acts of will—are choices, volitions in choice; but no one of them alone, nor all of them together, have as yet stirred a muscle. Another act of will is requisite to move the body and do the work intended: this may be called volition in the executive nexus.

The executive power of will is exerted both upon the mind and upon the body—upon the mind as in all acts whereby attention is confined to any particular topics; upon the body as in all cases of intended muscular movement.

The above, in a matter so well understood, may suffice as a sort of index pointing towards, rather than accurately defining, what is intended by the terms "will," "choice," "volition," and their synonyms; and we now proceed to the discussion of the question which, more than all others connected herewith, is of vital importance, namely—

II. The Freedom of the Will.—Fatalism is a denial of the existence of free-will in any sense in which the term may be used. What is it, because it could not not be; and what is not it, because it could not be. The actual is equal to the possible, and the non-existent is equal to the impossible. Eternal fate governs all existences and events. Of course atheists are universally fatalists. Materialism, when it asserts that nothing exists but matter, is inseparably associated with fatalism, and in any of the forms which it assumes it is logically fatalistic. Dualism and pantheism always lead in the same direction, though dualists and pantheists are not all professed fatalists. One form of professed theism is confessedly fatalistic, namely, that species of theism which affirms that God acts from the necessities of his nature, so that he does all he can do, and what he does he cannot avoid doing, the actual being, by the necessity of God's nature, the measure of the possible. All that is deemed needful to say of fatalism in this connection is that it contradicts the universal convictions of the human mind. All men, fatalists themselves included, have an ineradicable conviction that many things might be different from what they are. All men irresistibly conceive an essential difference between a man and a machine, and conceive that that difference is found chiefly in the fact that man chooses his ends and the means of their accomplishment, and the machine does not. Fatalism, if true, cannot be proved, for to admit the possibility of its truth long enough for the consideration of an argument is to admit that human thought is a necessary falsehood; and arguments against fatalism are evidently futile, for the fatalist is by his own profession compelled to ignore all confidence in his own thinkings. Rejecting as he does ultimate principles, denying intuitive truths, there is no foundation for an argument.

The antagonism between fatalism and freedom may be found in their answer to the question, Is mind subject to the law of necessity in every direction, and in the same sense that matter is subject to that law? The fatalist affirms and the freedomist denies. For all that is apparent, the antagonists must stand face to face forever—the one affirming and the other denying—with nothing for either to say that will be of any service to the other.

Among antifatalists there is great diversity of opinion, and here controversy begins. All are agreed in affirming the doctrine of human liberty, or technically in asserting the doctrine of free-will; but they instantly begin to differ by giving different and opposite definitions of the terms "liberty," "freedom," "certainty," "necessity," etc. This controversy may be as explicitly stated, and the arguments pro and con, as perspicuously presented, with some advantage as to brevity, as in any other method, by making the whole discussion consist in an answer to the sole question, Is there existent such a thing as a "power to the contrary?" It may be said that this question does not cover the whole ground of controversy, since some allow that "the power to the contrary" is essential to a probation, and that the first man possessed it; affirming only that the posterity of the first pair, by reason of their relation to the first sin, do not possess it. This is true; but it is also true that all, or well-nigh all, arguments adduced to prove the non-existence of a power to the contrary in the posterity of Adam prove, if they prove anything, not the non-existence, but the impossibility, of such a power. The question may be stated in other terms—Is mind a power competent for either of several different results? When the mind chooses A, could it at the same time and under the same circumstances have chosen B instead? Is mind, or is it not, an either-causal power? Is it, or is it not, in respect to any event, a first cause? The parties to this controversy have been called Freedomists and Necessitarians. We adopt these terms not only for convenience, but because they explicitly characterize the opinions held by each.

1. Freedomists affirm that the power to the contrary is not only conceivable, but actual; that it is involved in all intuitive conceptions of infinite power; that at any moment in infinite duration God can create or refrain from creating; that, creating a world, he can place its centre in any one given point in space or in any one of an infinite number of other points; that this power in God is absolutely free from all constraint, either from anything external to himself or from anything pertaining to his own nature. They further affirm that God created man in this feature of his image, so that to deprive man of it entirely would be to dehumanize him—would be to reduce him to the character and condition of a brute, or perhaps worse, to mere machinery. They still further affirm that the possession of this power is fundamental and essential in the make-up of a moral being. Necessitarians deny the power to the contrary. They affirm—stating it in the mildest terms they choose to adopt—an invariable antecedency in all events, psychical as well as physical. All phenomena are uniform, equally so whether pertaining to matter or to mind. External objects determine perception, perception determines emotion, emotion determines desire, desire determines volition in choice, volition in choice determines volition in the executive natus, and this determines the external muscular action. The chain is unbreakable; the connection between choice and desire is as uniform, as impossible to be otherwise, as is the connection between external object and perception. Every cause is potent only for one sole effect; every antecedent is followed, and must be followed, by one sole consequent. As Edwards puts it, the law of necessity governs all events; it is absurd to suppose the possibility of the opposite of what is. Discussions on this subject among theologians have primary and chief respect to the power for good. Pelagians affirm that the power for good is as essential to human nature as any other power. Of course it was not lost by the fall, and all men come into personal consciousness as fully possessed of power to choose the good as they are possessed of power to choose the evil. Augustinians and Arminians affirm that power to choose the good was lost by the first sin; that man became enslaved, and that the race have inherited the enslavement. Augustinians further affirm that the lost power is never restored; that if man wills a good, it is by a divine efficiency causing him thus to will—in other words, the power to the contrary does not exist in the human mind, has not since the first sin, and never will. Arminians agree with Pelagians in affirming that the power to the contrary is essential to a moral nature, to a being morally responsible, but differ from them when they deny that the power to good was lost by sin. Arminians agree with Augustinians in affirming that the posterity of the first pair have inherited an enslaved nature, but they differ from them when they assert that this enslavement is perpetual. Arminians affirm that the race, except the first pair, come into personal consciousness under grace; that the unconditioned benefits of atonement include not only personal existence, but also all the requisites of a fair probation, among which the power to refuse the evil and choose the good is chief, is fundamental and essential. These differences among theologians deserve mention in this connection; but it is not needful that they be kept in mind, for the discussion is the same, whether they be considered or left out of the account.

(1.) Freedomism is sustained by an appeal to universal consciousness. It is affirmed that every man does, every day of his life, many things with a consciousness while doing these things that he has power to do otherwise. It is objected to this appeal by opponents that consciousness testifies to the acts of mind, and not to its powers. This objection is an assumption which all psychologists do not admit, and it cannot be denied that man is, in some sense, conscious of his powers. But allowing the objection to stand for what it is worth, it is still averred that the consciousness of a conviction so universal as is the conviction that very many things we do, we do with the same ability to do otherwise that we have to do as we do, is as determinative as any conviction ever existing in consciousness. If consciousness can be relied upon in any testimony that it gives respecting human nature, or if a conviction existing in universal consciousness is any evidence that that conviction is true, then man is free in the sense of the freedomists; he possesses power, or, more accurately, he is himself a power for either of several results.

(2.) Freedomists affirm that the power to the contrary is essential to moral obligation; that a conviction of its existence arises necessarily from a consciousness of moral responsibility. It is affirmed that it is impossible for any one to feel responsible for any event, unless he also feels that that event is under his control. If one feels obligated to choose the good, he must also feel that he has power to do so; if he feels condemned for choosing the evil, he must also feel that he might have chosen the good. These convictions are in perfect accordance with what, in abstract science, must be judged as just, honorable, and right. Wherever obligation and responsibility exist, alternativity must be coexistent. In justice and in honor, punishment cannot be awarded for the unavoidable; if but one way be possible, moral desert is impossible. Necessitarians attempt to avoid these manifest inferences by affirming that not a power to contrary, but voluntariness, is the basis of obligation and responsibility; voluntariness, they say, is self-motion in the absence of constraint. It is said if a man choose evil unconstrained by anything extraneous to himself, he is responsible; though being what he is it were impossible for him to choose otherwise. Moreover, it is said that it is no matter how he came to be what he is, whether his depravity be concreated, infused, or self-imposed, if his acts are his own and not another's, he is responsible. Is this so? If without any fault or agency of my own I am a slave to evil desires, so that I have no power or ability to choose good, am I responsible for the evil I do? Let the common sense of mankind answer.

(3.) Freedomists aver that a denial of power to the contrary, if not itself identical with fatalism, is logically its equivalent, since absence of power to be otherwise equals necessity. The term necessity cannot be more accurately defined than by the term absence of power to the contrary. In reply, necessitarians make a distinction between a physical and a moral necessity; the former being found in the connection between a physical cause and its effect, and the latter between a mental state and its consequent. Edwards says the necessity he contends for is "the full and fixed connection between the thing signified by the subject and predicate of a proposition which affirms something to be true." The rejoinder of the freedomist is that necessity is always the same, whatever be the subject to which it applies, and is always impossibility of the opposite. No distinction founded on an irrelevant matter, nor the obscurity of Edwards's definition, avails to avert the force of the evident affirmation that absence of power to be otherwise is necessity, fate; and necessitarianism equals fatalism.

(4.) Freedomists affirm that to deny the power to the contrary is to deny human liberty fully and totally. If man cannot do otherwise than he does, he is not free. To avoid this affirmation, vicious definitions are given of the terms liberty, freedom, etc. Liberty is power to do as you will, to will as you choose, to do as you are pleased, etc. To do as you will defines physical liberty, the freedom of the body, and has no relation whatever to mental freedom. To will as you choose is without significance, because choosing is willing, and liberty, if anywhere, is found in the choice itself, and not in the accordance with it of any subsequent act either of body or mind. To will as you are pleased admits the inseparable connection between choice and antecedent pleasure or desire, and may reject the possibility of the opposite, and this is precisely that for which the definition is constructed. When used for this purpose, the outcome is simply a statement of the issue; the definition, and all that depends upon it, avails nothing in averting the affirmation that the denial of a possible opposite is a denial of the possibility of freedom fully and totally. Liberty does not exist, fixed fate governs all things.

(5.) As a corollary of the above, freedomists affirm that necessitarianism must, if consistent with itself, equally with fatalism, deny all moral distinctions and regard the idea of a moral government as chimerical.

2. The principal arguments adduced in support of necessitarianism are as follows:

(1.) Causality.—Volitions are effects, and must have a cause; the cause being what it is, the effect cannot be otherwise than it is. This is regarded by opponents as a plain begging of the question, for it assumes that all causes are potent only for one sole effect, when the question under discussion is whether or not mind is a cause equally potent for each of several different effects. If it be asked, What causes the mind to cause as it does? the answer is, Nothing causes it; it is itself first cause of its own volitions, and is by its nature an adequate cause of all its volitions, both general and particular.

(2.) Edwards's reductio ad absurdum. If the mind be self-determined, it must determine itself in any given volition by an antecedent volition; but if this antecedent volition be self-determined, it also must be determined by another antecedent volition, and so on ad infinitum. But to suppose such an infinite series of volitions is absurd; therefore mind is not self-determined. All the force of this argument comes from the unfortunate use of the term self-determined. Mind is not determined, it is itself determiner. The supposed antecedent volition is useless, and the series is stopped at its beginning.

(3.) Utility.—The question is asked, "What is the use of a power that is never used?" The events that do occur are produced each by a power adequate to its production; if there be a power adequate for the production of an opposite event, it is never used, is useless, and therefore need not be. The fallacy here consists in the assumption that the doctrine of freedom supposes two powers—one to do, and another not to do. Whereas the assertors of a power to the contrary affirm that the same one power is fully adequate to the production of either of several different results. Mind is such a cause that when it produces effect A, it is fully adequate to produce effect B instead.

(4.) Motivity.—It is said mind cannot act without a motive. In a conflict of motives the strongest must prevail, therefore volitions always are as the strongest motive. The fallacy of this argument comes from the materialistic idea conveyed by the term "strongest." There is no analogy between mental and material phenomena that admits of such argumentation. The strength of a motive cannot be represented by the weights of a balance; to infer prevalence from strength in mental the same as in physical phenomena is vicious. If, however, the term strongest motive must be used, it is indispensable that it be distinctly stated in what the strength of a motive consists; the term strength must be clearly defined. "The so-called strength of a motive," says Whedon, "may be defined the degree of probability that the will will choose in accordance with it, or on account of it." This definition being admitted, the argument is closed, for beyond all controversy it is evident that great improbabilities do sometimes occur; an improbability, however great, is not the equivalent even of a certainty, much less of a necessity.

But, again, the argument assumes that mind never acts but in view of motives, and that it cannot act without a motive. This is not admitted. Every active man, every day of his life, in a thousand indifferent and unimportant movements, both of mind and body, acts in the total absence from consciousness of any motive or reason for doing as he does; and, again, in an equilibrium of conflicting motives, clearly cognized in consciousness, man can make a choice. This is not a supposed case, but is of actual and frequent occurrence. Men frequently with strong motives for action find themselves without any motive whatever for action in one way rather than another, and yet in these circumstances they put forth volitions as readily and as easily as when a strong preponderance is obvious. The argument from the strength of motives is not determinative.

(5.) Divine Prescience.—Infinite wisdom must include a perfect knowledge from eternity of all existences and events. A complete history of the universe through all time must have always been perfectly cognized by the Divine Mind. God's foreknowledge can never be disappointed. All existences and events will be as God has from eternity foreknown them; therefore the opposite to what is, and the different from it, could not be; the power to the contrary does not exist. Let it be distinctly noted that the inference here is not merely the non-existence of a power to the contrary, but its impossibility; and if the argument proves an impossibility in human affairs, it also proves the same as to divine affairs—indeed, as to all events from eternity to eternity—and God himself is forever shut up to one sole and necessary history; the actual equals the possible; eternal fate governs God and all that is not God.

The premises are unquestionable, but the conclusion is a non-sequitur. A future event may be certain, may be known as certain, and its opposite be possible notwithstanding; will be is not the same as must be. The argument would be equally forcible if the foreknowledge of God were eliminated. Knowledge is not causative; the knowledge of an event has nothing to do with its production. All that the divine prescience of future events does in this argument is to prove their certainty. But this must be admitted without such proof: all things will be as they will be, whether God knows them or not. The history of the universe will be in one way, and not two; objective certainty is self-evident. But certainty is not necessity; it does not exclude the possibility of an opposite. Prescience neither helps nor hurts this case at all. If a man can see no difference between certainty and necessity, he cannot admit contingency; he is logically shut up to invincible fate. If one does apprehend a clear difference between will be and must be, he may affirm both prescience and contingency. Between these two parties thus cognizing these ultimate ideas there must be a perpetual difference of opinion on the question under discussion. Further controversy is useless; they have reached the ultimate of the question; they must stand face to face, one affirming contingency, and the other necessity, without the possibility of an argument from either that will be of any service to the other.

(6.) Divine Sovereignty.—God governs the world in accordance with a plan. No existence or event can be permitted to contravene his plan; all existences and events must be included in the plan, and each must form a constituent part thereof. To suppose anything contingent upon the human will is to take that thing from the purview of the divine sovereignty, subject it to human caprice, to uncertainty, to chance. Therefore nothing can be possible which is different from what is.

All the strength of this argument lies in one or the other, or both, of two conceptions. One of these conceptions is that a perfect government implies an absolute control, a determining efficiency; the other is that contingency is the equivalent of uncertainty, no cause, chance. The one conception is that the divine sovereignty cannot be complete and perfect unless all that is not God be reduced to the condition of machinery. The antagonist of this idea is the conception of a government of beings endowed with alternative powers. The idea that a contingency is an uncertainty is antagonized by the conception that contingency and certainty may both be predicated of the same event; it may be certain that a thing will be, and yet, at the same time, be possible that it may not be. These antagonizing conceptions are ultimate; and two parties, the one entertaining one and the other the other, must forever be at variance. Controversy closes, the one party affirming and the other denying. If God cannot know how his creatures will conduct themselves when endowed with alternative power, when left to determine their conduct by their own free will; if he cannot govern the world when much of its history is within the power of his creatures, when much that is, is determined and enacted by the free volitions of men, then freedomism must quit the field, and, as we see it, fatalism is triumphant. There are innumerable possibilities which never become actual; if the actual be the measure of the possible, then fate governs all things.

WILL, CALVINISTIC DOCTRINE OF THE. It is obvious that consistent Calvinists and Pelagians cannot hold the same theory as to the nature, conditions, and extent of the freedom of man in willing. It is no less certain that Evangelical Calvinists can, in perfect logical consistency with their system of faith, hold any theory of human freedom which is open to evangelical Arminians in consistency with the logic of their system.

I. Freedom of the Will.—It has always been part of the religious faith of Calvinists that man is a free responsible agent. The various methods of philosophically accounting for the fact of freedom, and the relation of the will to the other faculties of the soul, and of its freedom to the revealed doctrines of sin and grace, are elements of philosophy and not of theology. The Westminster Confession of Faith represents all other Calvinistic standards in asserting as follows:

Ch. iii, § 1. God has "unchangeably ordained whatsoever comes to pass; yet so as thereby neither is God the author of sin, nor is violence offered to the will of the creatures, nor is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away, but rather established."

Ch. v, § 2. "Although, in relation to the foreknowledge and decree of God, the first cause, all things come to pass immutably, yet, by the same providence, he ordereth them to fall out according to the nature of second causes, either necessarily, freely, or contingently."

Ch. ix, § 1. "God hath endued the will of man with that natural liberty, that it is neither forced nor by any absolute necessity of nature determined to good or evil."

This doctrine Calvinists have always maintained, and they have never held any other doctrines which, in their belief, were inconsistent with this fundamental doctrine of human freedom.

In former times Calvinistic theologians, while maintaining the freedom of man as a responsible moral agent, have generally felt impelled to set over against the fact of freedom the equally certain facts of man's moral depravity, and consequent voluntary aversion and moral inability to fulfill those obligations which spring out of our relation to God. This has been sharply emphasized in opposition to Pelagian error. But more recently, in consequence of the prevalence of pantheistic and materialistic modes of thought, which are alike fatalistic, Calvinists generally have been impelled to unite with their Wesleyan brethren in emphasizing the rational and moral self-determining power of the human soul which they had always held. This primary truth is the only and the efficient solvent alike of materialism and of pantheism in all their forms. It is the citadel of faith, the last tenable stronghold in defence of supernatural religion. We therefore not only hold to the freedom of the human soul in willing sincerely and in good faith, but we regard it as fundamental and essential, the truth of all others to be held aloft and vindicated at the present day.

That Calvinistic theologians as a class have always maintained the freedom of the human soul as the sole cause of its own volitions is so conspicuously true that such impartial, learned, and able critics as Sir William Hamilton (Discussions, Appendix I, A; and note on p. 402 of collected Works of Dugald Stewart), Dugald Stewart (Dissertation on the Progress of Philosophy), and Sir James Mackintosh (Note O to his Preliminary Dissertation) have affirmed that the doctrine of the will maintained by Jonathan Edwards is irreconcilably inconsistent with the doctrines of Augustine and Calvin, and the system they taught. In direct contradiction to this opinion, Edwards and Chalmers have held that the particular theory of liberty which they maintained—which has been absurdly misrepresented by its title of "philosophical necessity"—is essential to the logical defence of the Calvinistic system. Principal William Cunningham, in his article "Calvinism and the Doctrine of Philosophical Necessity," in his Reformers and the Theology of the Reformation, has incontrovertibly proved that both these opposite opinions, as to the relation of the Calvinistic system of theology to special theories of the freedom of the will, are false; and that neither the theory taught by Edwards, nor the theory of self-determination taught by Evangelical Arminians, or any other theory of the will which can be consistently held by Wesleyans, is excluded by the logic of Calvinism.

II. Opposition to Pelagianism.—Pelagians hold that the essence of free-will involves an absolutely unconditioned power of choice between good and evil, and that this power is inalienable from human nature and essential to responsible agency; that the moral agency of a man at any one moment cannot determine nor limit his moral agency at any other moment, but that he must possess, whatever his conduct, throughout his entire existence, full ability to will and to do all that God has any right to require of him; that moral character, whether good or bad, can be rationally predicated only of acts of the will, and not of any permanent states of the will or of the affections. Hence Pelagians deny—1. That Adam was created with a holy character antecedent to his own morally unbiassed action. 2. They deny that Adam was the representative head of the human race, and that, in consequence of his apostasy, his own nature or that of his posterity became morally depraved. 3. They deny that man's will is ever morally impotent, or unable to meet all the obligations resting upon him. 4. That the will of sinful man is dependent upon supernatural assistance, or that it can be effectually influenced by such grace without prejudice to its freedom or responsibility. 5. Socinians, the only comsistent Pelagians, hold that certainty is absolutely inconsistent with liberty, and that, consequently, God cannot foreknow the future free acts of men, or other contingent events.

Calvinists are, of course, prevented by their religious faith from agreeing with the above positions of the Pelagians as to the conditions of free agency. They hold that man was created with a positive holy character, yet able to obey or disobey. That man's moral nature has been since the fall totally corrupt, indisposed and disabled to obey God's holy law. That the influence of divine grace, preventive and co-operative, exercised in regeneration and sanctification, instead of limiting the liberty of the human will, re-establishes and reinvigorates it.

III. Ability and Liberty.—Hence Augustinians have sharply emphasized the distinction between liberty, the inalienable property of the human soul as a free rational moral agent, and ability, i. e. the power to will and do up to the full measure of our responsibility; or the power to will in a manner contrary to the prevailing moral state of the soul itself; or the power, by a mere volition, to change that prevalent moral state. The same distinction is signalized, by German philosophical theologians, by the terms Formale Freiheit, or ability, and Reale Freiheit, or liberty. The neglect of this distinction has led to much confusion. Augustine, Luther, and many of the older Augustinian theologians, in terms denied liberty, when they really meant only to deny to men moral ability to obey the divine law independently of supernatural grace. This has led many honest opponents of Calvinism, imperfectly acquainted with Augustinian theological literature, and the usage of technical language which prevails in it, to misunderstand altogether the meaning of many of our classical authorities. Calvinists, as they have understood themselves, have always maintained the freedom of the human will, and at the same time, and in perfect consistency, have denied the moral ability of man since the fall to obey God's law without supernatural grace. They have also always, and with equal consistency, maintained that all events, including the volitions of free agents as well as those dependent upon necessary causes, have been from eternity certainly future, and that this certain futurity has been determined by the sovereign foreordination of God.

But in all these points, except the last, Wesleyans and Calvinists agree. Different explanations and adjustments of these great commonplaces of Evangelical Christianity may distinguish them, but, as above generally stated, they are at one. God did create man with a nature holy, antecedent to all action, yet mutable (Watson, Institutes, pt. ii, ch. vi and xviii; and Wesley, as there quoted by Watson). Man, after his fall, continues to be a free and responsible moral agent, and yet is morally depraved before individual action, and is unable, before regeneration, and without the assistance of supernatural grace, to obey the divine law; and the operation of this grace does no violence to his freedom of will (Methodist Articles, art. viii; Watson, Institutes, pt. ii, ch. xviii; and Wesley on Original Sin). Saints in glory will be free, yet confirmed in holiness and not liable to fall into sin (Watson, Institutes, pt. ii, ch. xxix). The free acts of men and angels have always been certainly future to the infinite foreknowledge of God (ibid. pt. ii, ch. iv).

IV. Foreknowledge and Predestination.—Obviously, therefore, the only point at which the essential elements of the Calvinistic system even appear to bear upon the nature or conditions of human free agency in a manner different from that in which the essential principles of evangelical Arminianism bear upon the same is the point of the divine decrees. Calvinists hold that God has from eternity immutably foreknown and foreordained whatsoever comes to pass. Wesleyans hold that God has from eternity immutably foreknown whatsoever comes to pass. Both equally involve certainty, and neither involves anything else. Watson says "the great fallacy in the argument, that the certain prescience of a moral action destroys its contingency, lies in supposing that contingency and certainty are the opposite of each other." Anti-Calvinists commonly understand that divine foreordination necessarily includes the determination upon the part of God efficiently to bring to pass the things foreordained. But all events are effects either of necessary or of free causes. Foreordination of the effects of necessary causes, of course, does involve a putting-forth of divine efficiency to bring them to pass either immediately or mediately. But the foreordination of the effects of free causes, such as the volitions of free agents, of course, does not involve upon the part of God any purpose of putting forth efficiency to bring the foreordained volition to pass, except that involved in bringing the free agent into existence whom he foresaw would freely execute the volition in question; and in giving him power, either natural or gracious, to execute it. God eternally saw in idea all possible free agents, under all possible conditions, and all the volitions which they would freely exercise under all those conditions, if they were so created and conditioned. This knowledge (scientia simplicis intelligentiæ) precedes and conditions all foreordination. He then sovereignly chose out of the possible the entire system of things he desired to make actually future, and by this choice he made the futurity of all things certain. This foreordination precedes and conditions his foreknowledge of things certainly future. In order to execute it, God, in creation and providence, brings into existence and controls in action all necessary agents, including some sides of human nature; but as to free volitions, he simply brings the agents into existence and conditions them according to his plan, and graciously or naturally supplies them with the power necessary to will and act as predetermined, and then leaves them freely and contingently to will as he had certainly foreseen they would do. Or, as an eminent Calvinistic authority prefers to put it, "The Calvinistic position is stated with sufficient distinctness when it is said that the existing system of things or world-plan was present in the divine mind from all eternity, and was therefore both foreknown and foreordained." Thus the Calvinistic doctrine of the foreordination of free acts, like the Wesleyan doctrine of foreknowledge (which really does not differ from it as much as many suppose), simply involves the previous immutable certainty of the act, and in no way affects the freedom of the agent or the contingency of his act (Westminster Confession of Faith, iii, 1). It is free in its very essential nature. It is foreseen that the agent would exercise it if created and so conditioned. God makes it certainly future by his purpose to so create and so place that man. His creation and providential condition are brought about by the efficiency of God. His volition, although foreseen to be certainly future, is his own free spontaneous self-determination. Even if this explanation should be proved untrue or absurd, surely a thousand other reconciliations of these revealed truths may be possible to divine, although they should all be impossible to human, reason.

Hence, neither Calvinist nor evangelical Arminian can consistently hold a theory of the will involving the principles of Pelagianism which both repudiate. And hence, also, Wesleyans and Calvinists agreeing (1) that God's foreknowledge proves that all events are certainly future, and (2) that there can be no foreordination of a human volition in any sense or degree inconsistent with its perfect freedom, have, each of them, in consistency with the logic of their respective systems, precisely the same range of choice as to theories of the will as the other. Principal William Cunningham incontrovertibly proves this in essay ix, Reformers and Theology of the Reformation. That foreknowledge leads to foreordination is argued by professor L. D. McCabe, D.D., LL.D., in his Chautauqua Address for 1880, and in his work on The Foreknowledge of God; and hence he proposes to revolutionize Wesleyan theology by the introduction of the denial of God's foreknowledge of future contingent events.

V. The Edwardian Doctrine.—Edwards wrote against the Pelagianizing Arminians represented by Whitby, and in a theological interest, as he supposed. He proposed to settle forever, by strictly logical process, all the questions at issue. He argued that the act of the will is by a rigid law of causation determined by the strongest motive. "He does not carefully distinguish between the different usages of the word 'cause'; he seems to limit freedom too exclusively to executive volition; at times he implies that the whole causal power, producing volition, resides in the motives; his conception of causation is derived from the sphere of mechanics rather than from that of living spontaneous forces; and he is so in earnest in arguing against the self-determining power of the will as to neglect that element of self-determination which is undeniably found in every personal act" (Smith [Dr. Henry B.], in the Amer. Presb. and Theol. Review, Jan. 1865). Yet he never intended to deny that essential freedom of choice which is witnessed for in consciousness, and that he conducted his argument with consummate power is witnessed to by his most earnest opponents. He "set up a philosophy of the will which is not consonant with the doctrine that had been held by the main body of Augustinian theologians. . . . The doctrine of Augustine, however, and the more general doctrine, even, of Calvinistic theologians, the doctrine of Calvin himself, and of the Westminster Assembly's creeds, is that a certain liberty of will (ad utrumvis), or the power of contrary choice, had belonged to the first man, but had disappeared in the act of transgression, which brought his will into bondage to evil. It was the common doctrine, too, that in mankind now, while the will is enslaved as regards religious obedience, it remains free outside of this province in all civil and secular concerns. In this wide domain the power of contrary choice still remains" (Fisher [Rev. Prof. George P.], in the North American Review, March, 1879). Calvin says, in writing against Pighius, "If force be opposed to freedom, I acknowledge and will always affirm that there is a free will, a will determining itself, and proclaim every man who thinks otherwise a heretic. Let the will be called free in this sense, that is, because it is not constrained or impelled irresistibly from without, but determines itself by itself" (Henry, Life of Calvin, transl. by Stebbing, i, 497). Dr. Thomas Reid, the founder of the Scottish philosophy, was a Calvinistic minister, and in his Active Powers taught the freedom of the will. Sir William Hamilton, who was a member of a Calvinistic Church, and a believer in foreknowledge and foreordination, taught the same (see his Notes on Reid, and his Discussions). Dr. McCosh (Divine Government, bk. iii, ch. i, § 1 and 2) plainly enters his dissent from Edwards, although he regards the problem as to the consistency of the admitted self-determining power of the human soul and the universal reign of the law of causation to be at present insoluble. Henry P. Tappan has ably criticised Edwards in the interest of the "doctrine of a self-determined will," while he remains a consistent Calvinist.

There is no doubt that Edwards's celebrated treatise is an amazing monument of genius. In certain special directions its argument has never been answered, and, as far as can now be seen, never will be. Dr. Whedon's new view of the will is a practical testimony to the convincing power of Edwards's logic. His (Edwards's Infinite Series) remains a triumphant refutation of the old doctrine of the liberty of indifference. The position of the treatise before the public in the present age, however, is maintained not by its Calvinistic defenders, but by its persistent critics, who attack it because they believe it to be the citadel of Calvinistic theology. This is, and has always been, an entire mistake. Calvinists, as such, are independent of, and indifferent to, the psychological theory it advocates, and the fate of the argument on which that theory rests.

VI. Psychology of the Subject.—The question as to the human will and the laws of its action should be investigated purely as a psychological, and not as a theological, question. In this respect both Edwards and Whedon have equally erred. The opinion of most modern theologians, founded purely on psychological considerations, and independent of all theological bias, is, upon the whole, as follows. Great confusion has been imported into this difficult problem by the usage, common to both parties, of considering the will as a separate organ or agent, exterior to the reason, affection, desires, conscience, and other faculties of the soul. Conscientiousness affirms that the human soul is an absolute unit, not like the body a system of organs. The whole soul is the one organ of all its functions; the whole soul (Ego) thinks, desires, judges, feels; and the whole soul wills. The soul, that is, the person, is an original self-prompted cause, and is the sole and sufficient cause of all its volitions. In every free volition the soul is self-determined only, and had power to the contrary choice. The will, however, is not separate from the reason, but includes it; includes all the soul includes; is self-decided by its own contents and its own character; and hence is rational and moral, free and responsible.

If the problem be pushed further, and we are asked to affirm the relation which the previous states of the soul sustain to its volitions, most theologians believe that no satisfactory answer has ever been given. The answer of Edwards that the volitions are determined, through a rigid law of moral causation, by the preceding state of the soul, or by the strongest motive, appears to involve the reign within the will of the same law of cause and effect which prevails in the physical universe; and this it is difficult to prevent from degenerating into fatalism. The answer of Whedon that the will, independent of the reason, and the affections and the conscience can "project volitions" for the origin and direction of which no cause or reason whatever exists, except the bare power the man has to will anything, appears to us to involve pure chance (by excluding conscience and reason and personal character and content from the will itself). And chance is only another name for fate. It is better to be satisfied with the statement of the points in which all agree—(a) the free self-determining power of the soul itself in every free choice, (b) that in the free acts for which we are morally responsible we act for reasons, in view of moral considerations, and our personal character is revealed in the act—than to insist further upon a rational account of the genesis of each volition and its relation to the antecedent states of the soul. For hitherto no such account has been permanently regarded as satisfactory by either party.

Willard, JOSEPH, D.D., LL.D., a president of Harvard College, brother of Rev. John Willard, D.D., of Stratford, Conn., was born in Biddeford, Me., Dec. 29, 1738. He was the son of the Rev. Samuel Willard, minister of that town, and great-grandson of the Rev. Samuel Willard of the Old South Church, Boston, and vice-president of Harvard College. Joseph was born and reared in poverty, but by the aid of others and by his own energy he entered Harvard College, and graduated in 1765. He studied divinity after his graduation, was tutor in Greek for six years, and was ordained colleague pastor (with Joseph Champney) of the First Congregational Church in Beverly, Mass., in 1772. Here he preached until 1781, when he was elected president of Harvard University. For more than sixteen years he performed his duties without interruption by sickness; but in 1798 he was prostrated by a severe illness and could never afterwards attend to the work of the college with the same constancy. In August, 1804, he took a journey to the southern part of the state, and on his return from Nantucket to New Bedford he was seized at the latter place with sudden illness, and died in five days, Sept. 25, 1804. "President Willard's whole life was modelled on the sound and impregnable principles of religion, and presented an admirable specimen of the old Puritan character liberalized and improved. Generosity, disinterestedness, a lofty integrity, and honor were united with modesty, simplicity, and singleness of heart." In the administration of the college he was eminently faithful, and his firmness, dignity, affability, and benignity secured the cordial respect, and often the affection, of both the students and the faculty. As a preacher, he was plain, instructive, and solemn. President Willard was a thorough and profound scholar; especially in his knowledge of the Greek language and literature he had few superiors, if any. He wrote a Grammar of the Greek Language (the first, probably, that was written in English) which remains in manuscript in the library of the university. It shows great research. The publication of the Gloucester Greek Grammar when Dr. Willard's was nearly completed induced him to abandon the design of publication. A few occasional sermons were published. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 23-30; Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 40; Willard's Memoirs.

Willehad, St., apostle to the Frisians and Saxons, was born about A.D. 730 in the kingdom of Northumberland, of an ancient family. His early training was largely conducted by Alcuin (q. v.) of York. He reached Friesland in or about the year 770, and began his labors in the place (Dockum) where Boniface had been murdered, with successful results. His zeal drove him, however, to seek a region where Christianity had not been introduced, and he went, in consequence, to Eastern Frisia. Here the idolatrous people were extremely fanatical, and he escaped murder at their hands only through the narrow chance of a favorable lot being thrown when the gods were invoked. At another place, Drenthe, he was more successful, until the fanatical zeal of his own companions excited the anger of the people and compelled his removal. In the meantime his labors had been mentioned to Charlemagne, and in 781 that monarch intrusted to him the work of converting the Saxons in the vale of Wigmodi, on the Lower Weser, and also the neighboring Frisians. In this work he displayed great tact and zeal, and succeeded in a little while to a degree which had not been possible to Charlemagne with all his armies. Many families were converted and several churches founded during the two years which elapsed before the last rising of the Saxons under their duke, Widukind, against the new authorities. This rising occurred in 782, and was especially violent against the Christians who had been gathered by Willehad. The missionary saved himself by flight to Frisia, but a number of his assistants and friends were killed. The interval until the reconquest of the country was employed by Willehad in a visit to the pope, where he met with a fellow-laborer and sufferer among the heathen named Liutger, and in a sojourn—employed with devotional and literary duties, especially the copying of Paul's epistles—in one of Willebrord's convents at Echternach, near Treves. In 785 Widukind was baptized, and Willehad returned to his work in the region of the Lower Weser and resumed his labors. He established a central Church at Bremen and a smaller Church at Blexen. In 787, July 13, he was consecrated bishop at Worms, having previously been a simple presbyter. On his return, he found the Saxons unwilling to recognise a bishop placed over them by the conqueror and endowed with the right of exacting tithes; but he labored with persistent zeal to effect a firm establishment of the Church among them, and succeeded in dedicating the first Church in his diocese Nov. 1, 789. His administration, however, was but brief. He undertook a tour of visitation, the fatigues of which threw him into a violent fever, from which he died Nov. 8, 789. He had earned the reputation of a devout, eminently trustful, and very zealous Christian laborer, as well as of a modest, courageous, and abstemious man. He wholly abstained from the use of flesh food and intoxicating drink. His body was interred at Bremen and was credited with the performance of many miracles. Ansgar enumerates thirty-four such wonders, which involve not only many noteworthy historical and topographical traditions of that time, but also several psychological features which deserve examination. He was formally canonized, and two days, July 13 and Nov. 8, were set apart in his honor.

Willeram (or Williram, also Walram and Waltramus) was a learned German monk, and native of Franconia. On his return from Paris, where he had been to study philosophy and belles-lettres under able masters, he was appointed prebendary at Bamberg; but ere long he assumed the garb of a monk and retired into the convent at Fulda. The report of his piety, his merits, and his learning reached the emperor Henry III, who gave to him the Abbey of Ebersberg, Bavaria, in 1048, where he passed the remainder of his days. Willeram died May 7, 1085. He seems to have been concerned to improve the material interests of his monastery, as a number of exchanges of property made by him are on record, among them the barter of several devotional books for a vineyard possessed by bishop Henry of Trident. He had the reputation of being a scholar and a poet. We are indebted to him for a double paraphrase of Solomon's Song, one in hexameter verse in Latin, another in prose in the language of the ancient Franks. It was arranged in the form of a dialogue between bridegroom and bride. Several copies of this double work are preserved in manuscript in various libraries of Europe; the original is at the Abbey of Ebersberg. The Latin paraphrase had been brought out for the first time by Menrad Molther of Augsburg, under the title Wilrami Abbatis in Cantica Salomonis Mystica Explanatio (Hagenau, 1528). Paul Merula published the two texts, with notes and a Dutch translation, at Leyden, in 1598, entitled Willeram Paraphrasis Gemina in Canticum Canticorum, prior Rhythmis Latinis, Altera Veteri Lingua Francica. But, in spite of all his merit, his publication, after one poor manuscript was finished, remained incorrect and of little value. That which Marquard Freher had given in German from the manuscript at Heidelberg is more highly estimated. It was published at Worms in 1631 under the title Uhralte Verdolmetschung des hohen Liedes Salomonis. Schiller, the author of Thesaurus Antig. Teuton., formed a plan of reducing the work of Willeram, but he died before he had time to realize his project. His work was found among his papers, and Scherz took upon himself the task of completing it, and published it in Ulm in 1726. Through the efforts of M. de Fallersleben, an entire edition of the work was published by Hoffmann in German, at Breslau, in 1827. See Oefele, *Rerum Boicar. William (St.) OF AQUITAINE, duke, surnamed "the Great," was the son of count Thierry, and is thought to have been the brother of Charlemagne, who greatly honored him, and rewarded his services in reducing the Saracens in Spain. William founded a monastery in Gellone, a little valley on the borders of the diocese of Lodève, which he entered barefooted and in sack-cloth in 806, after having obtained the consent of his wife, and made provision for his children. He practiced great austerity, and died May 28, 812 or 813. His body was found in 1679 under the great altar of the church there. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxii, 594.

William OF ARIA, a goldsmith of Paris, flourished about the beginning of the 13th century. He stood forth as a preacher of the sect of the Holy Ghost, and announced the coming of judgments on a corrupt Church, and the inauguration of a new era in which the Holy Ghost was to permeate all. See Neander, Hist. of the Church, iv, 448.

William OF AUVERGNE (also called OF PARIS), a French prelate and theologian, was born at Aurillac about the close of the 12th century. He succeeded Barthélemy as bishop of Paris in 1228. He took a large part in the civil affairs of Louis X. At the same time he too deeply interested himself in the controversies of the day respecting benefices, combating the abuses with great vigor. He also erected several churches and monastic institutions. He died at Paris March 30, 1248. His works, which consist of many mystical treatises, were published by Leféron (Orleans, 1674, 2 vols. fol.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxii, 888.

William OF AUXERRE, a French theologian of the early part of the 13th century, became professor of theology in Paris, where he acquired a great reputation for learning. He died at Rome in 1230, leaving a Summa Theologica, written at Paris about 1216, of which Denis of Chartreux eventually published an abridgment. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxii, 697.

William OF CHAMPEAUX (Lat. Campellensis), a French scholastic, was born in the village of Champeaux, near Melun, about the close of the 11th century. He studied at Paris under Anselm of Laon, became archdeacon of Notre Dame, and taught dialectics in the cathedral school for many years. Among his scholars was the famous Abelard, who eventually eclipsed him. In 1105 Champeaux retired to a suburb of Paris, and there founded, in 1113, the Abbey of St. Victor. He soon opened a school of philosophy, rhetoric, and theology, and was next raised to the episcopacy of Chalons-sur-Marne. He became involved in the papal quarrel of the investitures (q. v.), and died in 1121. His principal published works are two treatises entitled Moralia Abbreviata and De Origine Animæ, together with a fragment on the eucharist, contained in Mabillon's edition of St. Bernard's Works. For these philosophic speculations, see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, ix, 626.

William OF CORBEUIL, archbishop of Canterbury, is generally supposed to have been a Frenchman. His first appearance in history is as one of the clerks of Ralph Flambard, bishop of Durham. William was selected by the bishop of London to be prior of St. Osyth. He was consecrated archbishop of the see of Canterbury in 1123. In 1128 he officiated at the coronation of king Stephen. His conduct in so doing has been severely censured. One important event connected with the history of archbishop William was the completion and consecration of the church commenced by Lanfranc and carried on by Anselm. This occurred May 4, 1130. "A dedication so famous," says Gervas, "was never heard of on earth, since the dedication of the Temple of Solomon." The archbishop died in 1136. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, ii, 302 sq.

William (St.) OF DIJON was born in 961 of a noble family, near Navarre (Italy), and was early dedicated to the Church. He became a proficient in sacred and profane learning, and retired first to Clugny, but was soon made abbe of St. Benigne, and superior of a large number of monasteries, into which he introduced wise reforms and a love of polite literature. He founded the abbey of Frutaire, commonly called St. Balain, in the diocese of Yvrée, and died at Fécamp (Normandy), Jan. 1, 1031. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxii, 595.

William OF MALMESBURY. See MALMESBURY.

William OF MODENA, a Roman Catholic bishop of the 13th century, was sent by pope Honorius III as a legate to Livonia about 1224. He was of great service to both the natives and their recent conquerors, the Germans, by exhorting the one to bear the yoke in submission, and charging the other to lay on the shoulders of their subjects no intolerable burdens. See Neander, Hist. of the Church, iv, 41.

William OF NEWBURY (Newburgh, or Newbridge), a canon of the monastery of Newbury, Yorkshire, was born in 1136, probably at Bridlington, Yorkshire, and died in 1208. He left a valuable history of England, extending from the Norman Conquest to the year 1197, entitled Gulielmi Neubrigensis Rerum Anglicarum Libri V (Antwerp, 1567).

William OF NOGARET. See NOGARET.

William I OF ORANGE (of the house of Nassau), the first leader in the Dutch war of independence, was born of Lutheran parents at Dillenburg, in Nassau, April 16, 1533. He was educated in the principles of the Reformed religion; but the emperor Charles V, who early became interested in his career, removed him to his court, and had him trained in the Roman Catholic faith. The emperor soon admitted the boy to great intimacy with him, allowing him alone to be present when he gave audience to foreign ambassadors, and in other ways honoring him with a confidence far above his years. The discretion which the young prince manifested in matters of public concern gained for him the surname of The Silent; and even the emperor avowed that he had been indebted to so young a man for important suggestions which had not occurred to his own mind. In 1554 he put him in command of troops, and employed him in diplomacy. On the abdication of Charles in favor of his son Philip II, the relation of William to the crown was materially changed. Philip hated him on account of the esteem in which he had been held by his father. Yet, under Philip, William paved the way for the treaty of Cateau-Cambrésis in 1559, and Henry II of France detained him and the duke of Alva as hostages for its execution. While Charles remained on the throne William adhered to the Roman faith; but on the abdication of that monarch he embraced Calvinism as readily as he had abandoned Lutheranism in his youth. This change was unknown to the French monarch at the time of his residence there, who, supposing him to enjoy the same confidence with Philip that he had enjoyed with Charles, incautiously revealed to him the secret of a treaty lately concluded between the crowns of France and Spain to exterminate "that accursed vermin the Protestants" in the dominions of both. William hastened to communicate this disclosure to the Protestant leaders at Brussels, and Philip discovered that he had revealed the secret. William was already a member of the council of state which was to assist Margaret of Parma in the regency of the Netherlands. Being also stadtholder of Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht, he was able to exert a strong influence in behalf of the Protestants, and largely undermine the designs of Philip. In 1564 he brought about the removal of Cardinal Granvelle, the principal enemy of the Protestants, but could not prevent the introduction of the Inquisition, and the increasingly strong hand of persecution. At length the approach of the bloody duke of Alva, to whom Philip had transferred the regency of the Netherlands from Margaret of Parma, was the signal to William of the coming contest. He avoided the tragical fate of Egmont and Horn by retiring for a few months to his paternal domains in Nassau. The cruelties of Alva to the Protestants of the Netherlands, his own wrongs, and perhaps political more than religious motives aroused William, in 1568, to an energetic course of opposition to the tyranny of Spain, which did not cease until triumph was complete. He published his Justification against the False Blame of his Calumniators, and began, in concert with the Protestant princes of Germany, to raise money and troops. His first operations miscarried. He was driven back with his army of 30,000 men into French Flanders; and in the spring of 1569 he, and his brothers Louis and Henry, with 1200 of his soldiers, joined the Huguenots under Coligni. Then again in 1572, after various successful engagements, in which he had had command of an army of 24,000 troops, he was compelled to disband it on account of the loss of all hope of assistance from France. In 1576 William secured the famous Union of Utrecht, which formed the basis of the Dutch republic. This union included the seven Protestant provinces of Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Friesland, Groningen, Overijssel, and Guelderland. As soon as this measure became known to Philip, he offered a reward of 25,000 crowns and a patent of nobility for his assassination. Once he was dangerously wounded, but the task was finally undertaken by Balthazar Gérard, a Burgundian fanatic, who obtained audience with the stadtholder on pretence of business, drew a pistol, and shot him through the body, at Delft, July 10, 1584. Y. 1866, 3 vols.); Klose, Wilhelm I von Oranien (Leips. 1864); Herrmann, Wilhelm von Oranien (Stuttg. 1873); Gachard, Correspondance de Guillaume le Taciturne (Brussels, 1847-56); and Juste, Guillaume le Taciturne d'après sa Correspondance et les Papiers d'Etat.

William of Ramsey, a monk of Croyland, of the time of Richard I, is known as a biographer of English saints, particularly in Chroniques Anglo-Normandes. See Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. (Anglo-Norman Period), p. 424.

William of Rubrugius. See RUYSBROEK.

William of St. Alban's, flourished about 1170, and is known chiefly for a Latin prose life of St. Alban, said to be a translation from an English life of that saint. The work has never been printed, but a copy of the MS. is in the Cottonian Library, and another in the library of Magdalen College, Oxford. See Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. (Anglo-Norman Period), p. 213.

William of St. Amour, in Burgundy, doctor of the Sorbonne, and a famous defender of the Paris University in the 13th century against the mendicant orders, which claimed the right to occupy regular chairs of theology in the university without consenting to be governed by its rules. Pope Innocent IV had seen the necessity of putting down the monks before his death, but under Alexander IV they obtained full control of the university. Under these circumstances, St. Amour attacked them, ridiculing their doctrine that manual labor is criminal, and that prayer will reap greater harvests from the soil than labor. He was summoned before the bishop of Paris, but acquitted because his accusers did not appear (1254). Alexander, nevertheless, issued three bulls in behalf of the Dominicans in 1255. In 1256 William published his book De Periculis Novissimorum Temporum, which, without specifying the orders endorsed by the pope, charged monks generally with being ignorant intruders into the pulpit and the teacher's chair, and also self-seeking proselyters, as well as professional beggars, liars, flatterers, and calumniators. It asserted directly that perfection consists in labor, in the performing of good works, and not at all in begging. St. Amour achieved great popularity in consequence, and found many imitators among the common people in ridiculing the monks, though the book was condemned by the pope, and its author was banished despite the ingenious defence he interposed at Rome. A French version of the work had already been put into circulation, however, and with such effect that men like Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura felt constrained to write in defence of mendicancy. The victory achieved over St. Amour enabled the orders to pursue their arbitrary methods without restraint, until the accession of popes Urban IV and Clement IV restored the rules of the university to some degree of honor. St. Amour was thereupon permitted to return, and was not again molested by the Dominicans. His death occurred probably in 1272. See Buleaux, Hist. Universit. Paris, iii, 260; Dupin, Nouv. Bibl. des Auteurs Eccl. vol. x; Schröckh, Kirchengesch. xxvii, 458 sq.; Hist. Lit. de la France, vol. xix; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

William of St. Thierry, a Belgian theologian, was born at Liege about the end of the 11th century. He studied in the abbey of St. Nicaise at Rheims, of which he was made prior in 1112, and eight years afterwards he became abbe of St. Thierry in the same vicinity. In 1134 he retired to the monastery of Ligny, and died in 1150. He was a great friend of St. Bernard, and an admirer of Abelard. He wrote a number of doctrinal, practical, and historical discussions, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxii, 665.

William the Trouvère translated into Anglo-Norman verse accounts of miracles of the Virgin and legends of the saints. See Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. (Anglo-Norman Period), p. 464.

William of Waynflete. See WAYNFLETE.

William of Wycumb, an English clergyman of the 12th century, became prior of Lathony, and chaplain of Robert de Betun, bishop of Hereford. After the death of that prelate (1149) he wrote a sketch of his life, which is published in Wharton's Anglia Sacra, ii, 293 sq. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

William of Wykeham. See WYKEHAM.

Williams, Charles S., D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born June 11, 1791, in the County of Kent, England (where his father, Rev. William Williams, was rector of a parish). He entered the army when young, and passed some time in India; on his return from India he joined the Dragoons, and served with them during a part of the Peninsula War. At Toulouse he was severely wounded, and was left all night among the dead and dying on the field. He graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and was ordained in 1820. In 1823 he came to the United States, and became rector of St. John's Church, York, Pa. For about eight years he was president of Baltimore College, having charge, at the same time, of the parish at Elk Ridge. During the last twenty-two years of his life he resided in Philadelphia, devoting himself to the cause of education, and officiating almost constantly for his brethren of the clergy. He died there, June 12, 1859. See Amer. Quar. Church Review, 1859, p. 534.

Williams, Daniel, D.D., an eminent English Presbyterian divine, was born at Wrexham, Denbighshire, in North Wales, about 1644. His early educational advantages seem to have been rather limited, but he was admitted a preacher among the Presbyterians in 1663. To avoid the penalties of the law against Dissenters, he went to Ireland, where he became chaplain to the countess of Meath. Some time after, he was called to be pastor to a congregation of Dissenters assembling in Wood Street, Dublin, where he continued for nearly twenty years. During the troublous times in the latter end of the reign of James II, he found it necessary to return to London in 1687, where he continued to reside. Here he was often consulted by William III in reference to Irish affairs, and did great service in behalf of many who fled from Ireland. He became pastor of a numerous congregation at Hand Alley, Bishopsgate Street, in 1688, and in 1691 succeeded Richard Baxter as preacher of the Merchants' Lecture at Pinner's Hall, Broad Street. On account of clashings in the lectures, he, with others of the incumbents, withdrew, and established another lecture at Salter's Hall, on the same day and hour. This led to a sharp controversy between the two parties, and a great deal of bitter feeling. He died Jan. 26, 1716. The bulk of his estate he bequeathed to a great variety of charities. The most important of these charities was the founding of the Red Cross Street Library. He ordered a convenient building to be obtained for the reception of his own library, and the curious collection of Dr. Bates, which he purchased for that purpose. Accordingly, several years after his death, a commodious building was erected (1727) by subscription among the wealthy Dissenters in Red Cross Street, Cripplegate, where the books were deposited, and by subsequent additions the collection has become a considerable one, containing more than 20,000 volumes. It is also a depository for paintings of Nonconformist ministers, manuscripts, and other matters of curiosity or utility. It is here that the Dissenting ministers meet for the transaction of all business relating to the general body. Registers of births of the children of Dissenters are also kept here with accuracy, and have been allowed equal validity in courts of law with parish registers. Dr. Williams was the author of, The Vanity of Childhood and Youth; in Several Sermons (1691);—Gospel Truth Stated and Vindicated (1692);—A Defence of Gospel Truth (1693);—Man Made Righteous by Christ's Obedience; Sermons (1694);—Discourses on Several Important Subjects (1738-50);—and Tractatus Selecti, ex Anglicis Latine Versi, et Testamenti sui Jussu Editi (1760).

Williams, Eliphalet, D.D., a Congregational minister, son of Solomon Williams, D.D., of Lebanon, Conn., was born Feb. 21, 1727. He graduated at Yale College in 1743; was ordained minister in East Hartford in March, 1748; and died June 29, 1803. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 323.

Williams, Griffith, D.D., an English divine, was born at Carnarvon, in North Wales, about 1589. He entered Oxford University in 1603, but two years later entered Jesus College, Cambridge, where he graduated and entered into holy orders. He became curate of Hanwell, Middlesex; rector of Foscot, Buckinghamshire; and lecturer of St. Peter's, Cheapside, London; was suspended by the bishop of London in 1615; received the living of Llanllechid, in the diocese of Bangor; became domestic chaplain to the earl of Montgomery, and tutor to his children; was promoted to be chaplain to the king, and prebendary of Westminster; was instituted dean of Bangor, March 28, 1634; was consecrated bishop of Ossory, Ireland, in 1641, but was obliged to fly to England on the breaking-out of the Irish Rebellion, in less than a month after taking possession; endured great hardships for many years on account of his attachment to the crown; regained his bishopric at the Restoration, and died at Kilkenny, March 29, 1672. Among his published works are, The Delights of the Saints (1622);—Seven Golden Candlesticks (1627);—The True Church (1629);—The Right Way to the Best Religion (1636);—Vindiciæ Regum (1643);—The Discovery of Mysteries (eod.);—Discourse on the Only Way to Preserve Life (1644);—Jura Majestatis (eod.);—The Great Antichrist Revealed (1660);—Description and Practice of the Four Most Admirable Beasts (1663);—The Persecution of John Bale and of Griffith Williams (1664);—Sermons and Treatises (1665). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Williams, John (1), D.D., a distinguished English prelate, was born at Aber-Conway, Carnarvonshire, Wales, March 25, 1582. He was admitted to St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1598; graduated there in 1602, and was made fellow; took holy orders in 1609, and was appointed to a small living near Bury St. Edmund's, upon the borders of Norfolk; was presented to the rectory of Grafton-Regis, Northamptonshire, in 1611; appointed chaplain to lord Egerton the same year, by whom he was promoted to the rectory of Grafton-Underwood, Northamptonshire; made precentor of Lincoln in 1613; rector of Waldgrave, Northamptonshire, in 1614, and between that year and 1617 was made prebendary and residentiary in the Church of Lincoln, prebendary of Peterborough, of Hereford, and of St. David's, and secured a sinecure in North Wales. On the accession of Francis Bacon as lord-keeper, he was made justice of the peace for Northamptonshire, and chaplain to the king at the same time; became dean of Salisbury in 1619, and of Westminster in 1620; was made lord-keeper of the great seal of England July 10, 1621, and in the same month bishop of Lincoln; was removed from his post as lord-keeper by Charles I in October, 1626; in 1636 convicted of subornation of perjury when tried for betraying the king's secrets, fined £10,000, suspended from his offices and imprisoned in the Tower, where he remained three years and six months; was released, and resumed his seat in the House of Lords in 1640, and by command of the king had all the records of proceedings against him cancelled; became archbishop of York in 1641; retired to his estate at Aber-Conway in July, 1642, and fortified Conway Castle for the king. After the death of Charles I, he spent the remainder of his days in sorrow, study, and devotion, and died March 25, 1650. He published several Sermons, and The Holy Table, Name and Thing more Anciently, Properly, and Literally Used under the New Testament than that of Altar (1637).

Williams, John (2), D.D., an eminent English divine, was born in Northamptonshire in 1634. He entered as a commoner of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in 1651, where he completed his degrees in arts, and was ordained in 1658; was made rector of St. Mildred-in-the-Poultry, London, in 1673; prebendary of Reymere, in St. Paul's, in 1683; became chaplain to William and Mary after the Revolution; was preferred to a prebend of Canterbury, and was consecrated bishop of Chichester in December, 1696, where he died in 1709. He was the author of, Hist. of the Gunpowder Treason (1679);—Brief Exposition of the Church Catechism (1690);—Twelve Sermons Preached at the Boyle Lectures concerning the Possibility, Necessity, and Certainty of Divine Revelation (1695-96);—and other works.

Williams, John (3), LL.D., a Socinian minister, was born at Lampeter, Cardiganshire, Wales, in 1726. He was pastor of a Church at Sydenham, Kent, from 1758 until his death, at Islington, in 1798. He published, A Concordance to the Greek Testament, with the English Version to each Word, etc. (1767);—Thoughts on Subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles;—Free Inquiry into the Authenticity of the First and Second Chapters of St. Matthew's Gospel (1771);—Clerical Reform (1792);—and other works, including Sermons.

Williams, Joshua, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born in Chester County, Pa., Aug. 8, 1767. He pursued his preparatory studies in Gettysburg; graduated at Dickinson College in 1795; studied theology privately; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Carlisle Oct. 4, 1797, and was ordained and installed pastor of the united congregations of Derry and Paxton, Oct. 2, 1799. In April, 1802, he became pastor of the Congregation of Big Spring, where he continued to labor for twenty-seven years, during which period, as appears from his church register, he admitted to communion four hundred and twenty-six persons. In April, 1829, on account of bodily infirmities, he resigned his charge, but continued to preach as his health permitted and opportunity offered until his death, Aug. 21, 1838. Dr. Williams was a man of vigorous and comprehensive mind, learned and able in his profession; as a preacher, sound, evangelical, and instructive. His only publication, besides occasional contributions to periodicals, was a Sermon on the Sinner's Inability. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 186; Nevins, Churches of the Valley; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (J. L. S.)

Williams, Nathan, D.D., a Congregational minister, son of Stephen Williams, D.D., of Longmeadow, Mass., was born Oct. 28, 1735. He graduated at Yale College in 1755; was ordained pastor of the Church in Tolland, Conn., April 30, 1760; from 1788 to 1808 was a member of the Corporation of Yale College, and died April 25, 1829. He published, A Dialogue on Christian Baptism and Discipline (2d ed. 1792). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 287.

Williams, Peter, D.D., an English clergyman, was born during the latter part of the 18th century, and became archdeacon of Merioneth in 1802. He published, A Short Vindication of the Established Church (1803);—First Book of Homer's Iliad, Translated into Blank Verse (1806);—Remarks on Britain Independent of Commerce (1808);—and Remarks on the Recognition of Each Other in the Future State (1809).

Williams, Philip, D.D., an English clergyman of the 18th century, became a fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1730, and was rector of Starston and Barrow. He published a volume of Observations (1733), some controversial works, and a number of Sermons.

Williams, Robert, was one of the earliest Methodist ministers in America. Previous to his leaving England, Mr. Wesley had given him permission to preach under the direction of the regular ministers. He first labored for a time in New York city. Under date of Nov. 1, 1769, Mr. Pilmoor, then in Philadelphia, writes, "Robert Williams called, on his way from New York to Maryland. He came over about business, and being a local preacher in England, Mr. Wesley gave him a license to preach occasionally under the direction of the regular preachers." He afterwards speaks of him as "very sincere and zealous." Williams spent the greater part of his time in Maryland, where he was instrumental in commencing a great work. In 1772 he passed south into Virginia, where his labors were greatly blessed. Early in 1775 he located, and Sept. 26, 1775, he died. Bishop Asbury says of him, "He has been a very useful, laborious man, and the Lord gave him many souls to his ministry. Perhaps no man in America has ministered to awakening so many souls as God has awakened by him." It has been said of him that "he was the first travelling preacher in America that married, located, and died." See Bangs, Hist. of the M. E. Church, i, 73, 76, 89; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 11.

Williams, Roger, the founder of the colony of Rhode Island, was born at Conwy Cayo, Wales, in 1599. In his youth he went to London, and attracted the attention of Sir Edward Coke by his short-hand notes of sermons and speeches in the Star-Chamber, and was sent by him to Sutton's Hospital (now the Charterhouse School) in 1621. On April 30, 1624, he entered Jesus College, Oxford, where he obtained an exhibition. According to some authorities, he was admitted to Pembroke College, Cambridge, Jan. 29, 1623, and matriculated pensioner July 7, 1625, graduating A.B. in January, 1627. He studied Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, and Dutch, and took orders in the Church of England. He soon, however, became an extreme Puritan, with tendencies towards the views of the Baptists, who were rapidly rising in England at that time. To avoid the persecution then rife in his own country, he emigrated to New England, arriving at Boston Feb. 5, 1631, accompanied by his wife, Mary. He refused to join the congregation at Boston, because the people would not make public declaration of their repentance for having been in communion with the Church of England. He therefore went to Salem, to become the assistant to pastor Skelton; but the general court remonstrated against his settlement there, on account of his attitude towards the Boston congregation; and, further, that he "had declared his opinion that the magistrate might not punish" Sabbath-breaking and other religious offences, as belonging to the first table of the law. His ministry at Salem was brief. Before the close of the summer, persecution drove him to Plymouth, where for two years he was assistant to the pastor, Ralph Smith. At the close of this period he was invited to return to Salem as assistant to Skelton, and, after the latter's death, became pastor. In a short time he had very generally indoctrinated the people with his peculiar views. In the autumn of 1635 the general court banished him from the colony, with orders to depart within six weeks, because he had called in question the authority of magistrates in respect to two things—one relating to the right of the king to appropriate and grant the lands of the Indians without purchase, and the other to the right of the civil power to impose faith and worship. On the first of these questions he had written a paper in which he defended the right of the natives to the soil; but on the interference of the court he put in an explanation, and consented to the burning of the MS. when they were somewhat more leniently disposed towards him. But on the other question he reiterated and amplified his views; and when oppressed by his opponents, frankly declared his opinion that the magistrate ought not to interfere "even to stop a church from apostasy and heresy," and that the office of civil magistrate "extends only to the bodies and goods and outward estates of man." He was the first to assert fully the doctrine of entire liberty of conscience, the right of every person to worship in what manner he pleased, or to refrain from public worship altogether without interference on the part of the civil magistrate. In reply to the charges against him, and in defence of his views, he published a pamphlet entitled Mr. Cotton's Letter Examined and Answered (printed in 1644). Winter being at hand, the period for his departure was extended until spring; but he persisted in preaching, and the people flocked to hear him. It became generally understood that many had decided to go with him to found a new colony not far distant, and the court decided to send him at once to England, regarding him as a dangerous person in the colony. A small vessel was despatched to Salem to convey him away; but he was forewarned, and fled before its arrival. Leaving family and friends in mid-winter, he was "for fourteen weeks sorely tossed in a bitter season, not knowing what bread or bed did mean." But he had learned the Indian language while at Plymouth, and was kindly received and sheltered by the savages. He selected a site for his new colony on the shores of the Narraganset; and, after purchasing lands on the eastern shore of the Seekonk River, and planting his corn, he learned that he was within the limits of the Plymouth colony. He therefore set out, with five companions, to make new explorations. They proceeded in a canoe to the spot which Williams fixed upon as his home. He said that he had "made covenant of peaceable neighborhood with all the sachems and nations round about;" "and having, of a sense of God's merciful providence" to them in their distress, called the place Providence, he "desired it might be for a shelter for persons distressed for conscience." Here he was joined by others who sympathized with his opinions, and even people from England flocked thither in considerable numbers. Roger Williams was the founder, the lawgiver, and the minister of the infant colony, but he did not aim to be its ruler. His purpose was to found a commonwealth in the form of a pure democracy, where the will of the majority should govern, but only in civil affairs, leaving matters of conscience to be settled between the individual and his God. The original constitution, which all were required to sign, was in these words: "We whose names are hereunder, desirous to inhabit the town of Providence, do promise to subject ourselves, in active or passive obedience, to all such orders or agreements as shall be made for the public good of the body, in an orderly way, by the major consent of the present inhabitants, masters of families, incorporated together in a town of fellowship, and others whom they shall admit into the same, only in civil things." With this foundation for a civil government, Williams went on to organize the Church in accordance with his own views. Having adopted the belief in baptism of adults by immersion only, he was baptized by Ezekiel Holliman, a layman, in March, 1639; and then he baptized Holliman and about ten others. He soon entertained doubts as to the validity of the proceeding, and early withdrew from the Church thus organized. The colony remained for some years a pure democracy, transacting its business in town-meetings; but the time was coming for a more systematic organization. Accordingly, in 1643, Williams was sent to England to procure a charter. He was treated with marked respect by the Parliament, and a charter incorporating the settlers on Narraganset Bay, with "full power and authority to govern themselves," was granted. Williams returned the following year, and was received in triumph by the inhabitants of Rhode Island. On his voyage to England he had prepared a Key to the Languages of America, including also observations on the manners, habits, laws, and religion of the Indian tribes. This work he published in London; and about the same time The Bloody Tenent of Persecution for Cause of Conscience Discussed in a Conference between Truth and Peace (Lond. 1644; new ed. Providence, 1867). On his return to Rhode Island, he refused the office of president of the colony; but when the rights granted by the charter were about to be infringed, he was sent to England again in 1651 to secure a confirmation of the rights of the colony, and was entirely successful. While in England the second time he published The Bloody Tenent yet More Bloody, by Cotton's Endeavor to Wash it White in the Blood of the Lambe, etc. (1652):—The Hireling Ministry None of Christ's; or, A Discourse Touching the Propagating the Gospel of Jesus Christ, etc. (eod.):—and Experiments of Spiritual Life and Health and their Preservatives (eod.). He also engaged in teaching languages by the conversational method, and thus became acquainted with John Milton, Oliver Cromwell, Sir Henry Vane, and other persons of eminence. In 1654 he returned to Rhode Island, and was elected president of the colony, which post he held two years and a half. He refused to persecute the Quakers, but met some of their ablest preachers in public debate; and in 1672 published a work in opposition to the sect entitled George Fox Digged out of his Burrows, or an Offer of Disputation on Fourteen Proposals, made this Last Summer, 1672 (so called), unto G. Fox, then Present in Rhode Island in New England, etc. By his constant friendship with the Indians he was of great service to the other colonies; but they refused to remove their ban, or to admit Rhode Island into their league. He died in 1683, and was buried in his family burying-ground, near the spot where he landed. Memoirs of the life of Roger Williams have been written by James D. Knowles (Boston, 1833), William Grammell (ibid. 1846), and Romeo Elton (Lond. 1852). His works have been reprinted by the Narragansett Club in 6 vols. folio (Providence, 1866-75). Among the works not already named is Letters from Roger Williams to John Winthrop, and John Winthrop, Jr., Governor of Connecticut (Boston, 1863). A tract by Roger Williams, recently discovered, is in the John Carter Brown Library at Providence. See also Dexter, As to Roger Williams and his Banishment from the Massachusetts Plantation, with a Few Further Words concerning the Baptists, Quakers, and Religious Liberty (ibid. 1876); and Arnold, History of Rhode Island (vol. i, 1860).

Williams, Rowland, D.D., an English clergyman, was born at Halkin, Flintshire, Wales, Aug. 16, 1817. He was educated at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1841; was chosen fellow, and in 1842 elected tutor of his college; took orders, and became identified with the reform movement at Cambridge and with the Broad Church movement, which was headed by Arnold and Maurice; became vice-principal and professor of Hebrew in the Welsh Theological College of St. David's at Lampeter, and chaplain to the bishop of Llandaff, in 1850; was appointed select preacher to the University of Cambridge in 1854; became vicar of Broad Chalk, Wiltshire, in 1859; was one of the authors of the famous volume of Essays and Reviews (1860), for which act he was prosecuted in the Court of Arches, and condemned in December, 1862, but obtained a reversal of the judgment in February, 1864; resigned his professorship in 1862, and thereafter resided at his vicarage in Broad Chalk, near Salisbury, where he died Jan. 18, 1870. His principal published works are, Lays from the Cimbric Lyre:—Account of St. David's College, Lampeter:—Rational Godliness (1855):—Christianity and Hinduism (1856):—Christian Freedom in the Council of Jerusalem (1857):—The Hebrew Prophets Translated Afresh (1868-71, 2 vols.):—Broad Chalk Sermon-Essays on Nature, Mediation, Atonement, and Abolition (1867):—Owen Glendower, a Dramatic Biography, and Other Poems (1870):—and Psalms and Litanies (1872), edited by his widow, who also published his Life and Letters (1874).

Williams, Solomon, D.D., a Congregational minister, son of the Rev. William Williams, of Hatfield, Mass., was born June 4, 1700. He graduated at Harvard College in 1719, and was ordained pastor of the Church in Lebanon, Conn., Dec. 5, 1722. In 1746 he became involved in a controversy on the nature of justifying faith with the Rev. Andrew Crosswell, and in 1751 in another with his cousin, the elder Jonathan Edwards, concerning the Christian sacraments. In the extensive revival of 1740 he showed himself a decided friend to Whitefield, whom he repeatedly welcomed to his pulpit. He died Feb. 29, 1776. He published, Substance of Two Discourses on the Occasion of the Death by Drowning of Mr. John Woodward and of the Deliverance of Mr. Samuel Gray (1741):—A Vindication of the Gospel Doctrine of Justification by Faith (1746), being an answer to the Rev. Andrew Crosswell's book, "On Justifying Faith":—The True State of the Question concerning the Qualifications Necessary to Lawful Communion in the Christian Sacraments (1751), being an answer to the Rev. Jonathan Edwards's "Humble Inquiry," etc.:—and several occasional Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 321.

Williams, Stephen (1), D.D., a Congregational minister, son of the Rev. John Williams of Deerfield, Mass., was born May 14, 1693. When in his eleventh year, he was taken captive by the Indians, with all his father's family except one brother, and subjected to great suffering on the journey to Canada. Having been separated from the rest of the family, he did not meet any of them again for fourteen months. He was released at Quebec through the intercession of friends in New England, and arrived in Boston, Mass., Nov. 21, 1705, nearly twenty-one months from the beginning of his captivity. In 1713 he graduated at Harvard College, and then taught school at Hadley for one year. After preaching at Longmeadow for about two years, he was ordained there Oct. 17, 1716. During three campaigns he served as chaplain in the army: at Cape Breton, in 1745, under Sir William Pepperell; went to Lake George, in 1755, under Sir William Johnson; and in the year following was under General Winslow. He was an important agent in establishing the mission in 1734 among the Housatonic Indians in Stockbridge. He died June 10, 1782. His only publication was A Sermon at the Ordination of John Keep (1772). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 284.

Williams, Stephen (2), a Congregational minister, son of the preceding, and father of the Rev. Stephen Williams of Fitzwilliam, N. H., was born at Longmeadow, Mass., Jan. 26, 1722. He graduated at Yale College in 1741, studied theology with his father, was ordained first pastor of Woodstock (West) in 1747, and continued in charge until his death, April 20, 1796. He was a good classical scholar, a practical preacher, and much esteemed by his people. See Cong. Quar. 1861, p. 355; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 287.

Williams, Thomas, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in the city of Durham, England, July 6, 1811. He was converted in 1835, graduated at Hoxton in 1840, joined the British Wesleyan Conference, and was appointed to Glasgow. Three years later he removed to Edinburgh, where he formed a close friendship with the famous Dr. Chalmers, and from thence he removed to the Stockport North Circuit, where he published his Defence of the British Wesleyan Conference against the Fly-sheets Vindicated. In 1849 he was appointed to the Leeds First Circuit, where he published his Address to the Methodist societies. In 1852 he was appointed to City Road, London (First Circuit); and in 1854 emigrated to America, joined the Rock River Conference, and was stationed at Indiana Street Church, Chicago, where he continued three years. Mr. Williams was transferred in 1858 to the Missouri Conference, and was appointed pastor of Ebenezer Church, St. Louis. On the death of the president of the University of Missouri, at Jefferson City, Mr. Williams was elected to fill the vacancy. Failing health in 1861 caused him to travel East for its restoration. He stopped at Saratoga, and there died the same year. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 5.

Williams, William, called the "Watts of Wales," was born in 1717, in the parish of Llanfair-ar-y-Bryn, Carmarthenshire, Wales. His conversion he traced to the preaching of Howel Harris. He left the Established Church at the age of thirty-two, and connected himself with the Methodists, among whom he was recognized as one of their most popular preachers. Gifted with poetical talents of a high order, like Charles Wesley, he consecrated his genius to the cause of his Master. He published the following works: Alleluia (Bristol, 1745-47, 6 pts.):—The Sea of Glass:—Visible Farewell:—Welcome to Invisible Things:—and An Elegy on Whitefield, dedicated to the countess of Huntingdon. His death occurred in 1791. Mr. Williams was the author of the hymn "O'er the gloomy hills of darkness," etc. His best-known hymn—one that is found in so many collections of hymns—is that commencing with the words "Guide me, O thou great Jehovah." The history of this hymn is thus given: Lady Huntingdon having read one of Williams's books with much spiritual satisfaction, persuaded him to prepare a collection of hymns, to be called the Gloria in Excelsis, for especial use in Mr. Whitefield's Orphans' House in America. In this collection appeared the original stanzas of "Guide me, O thou great Jehovah." In 1774, two years after its publication in the Gloria in Excelsis, it was republished in England in Mr. Whitefield's collections of hymns. Its rendering from the Welsh into English is attributed to W. Evans, who gives a translation similar to that found in the present collections of hymns. The hymn was taken up by the Calvinist Methodists, embodying, as it did, a metrical prayer for God's overcoming strength and victorious deliverance in life's hours of discipline and trial, expressed in truly majestic language, in harmony with a firm religious reliance and trust, and a lofty experimental faith. It immediately became popular among all denominations of Christians, holding a place in the affections of the Church with Robinson's "Come, thou Fount of every blessing." The fourth verse is usually omitted:

"Musing on my habitation,
Musing on my heavenly home,
Fills my heart with holy longing—
Come, Lord Jesus, quickly come.
Vanity is all I see,
Lord, I long to be with thee."

See Butterworth, Story of the Hymns, p. 30-34. (J. C. S.)

Williamson, Isaac Dowd, D.D., a Universalist clergyman, was born at Pomfret, Vt., April 4, 1807. He had no better early educational advantages than a district school, and learned the clothier's trade; but force of character and thirst for knowledge made amends for lack of external aid, and in 1827 we find him preaching in Springfield. Subsequently he labored as supply in Langdon, N. H.; as pastor, in 1828, at Jeffrey; in 1829 at Albany, N. Y., where he lived seven years, and published his first book, An Argument for Christianity; removed to Poughkeepsie in 1837; to Baltimore in 1839; to New York city in 1841; to Mobile, Ala., three years later; to Memphis, Tenn., two years later; to Lowell, Mass., in 1850; to Louisville, Ky., in 1851; to Cincinnati, O., in 1853; and in 1856 to Philadelphia, where he spent three years. He died in Cincinnati, Nov. 26, 1876. Dr. Williamson was largely engaged during his ministerial career as editor and publisher of the Gospel Anchor, in Troy, N. Y., in 1830; the Religious Inquirer, in Hartford, Conn.; the Herald and Era, in Louisville, Ky., in 1852; and for ten years was connected with the Star in the West as joint proprietor and editor. Besides the above-named Argument for Christianity, he published An Exposition and Defence of Universalism (1840, 18mo):—An Examination of the Doctrine of Endless Punishment (1847, 18mo):—Sermons for the Times and People (1849, 18mo):—The Philosophy of Universalism, or Reasons for our Faith (1866, 12mo):—besides other valuable works. He was essentially a pioneer, emphatically a self-made man, a man of strong convictions and robust intellect, and a prominent member of the Odd-fellows' Society. He was logical, sincere, lucid, ingenious, and magnetic. See Universalist Register, 1878, p. 82.

Willibald, St., and first bishop of Eichstätt, was a steadfast supporter of Boniface in the work of Christianizing the Germans. He was born about A.D. 700, in England, of noble Saxon parents; and in his third year, during a severe sickness, was dedicated to the service of the Church. In his fifth year abbot Egbald, of Waltham, undertook his education. In 720 he undertook a pilgrimage to Rome, in company with his father and brother (Wunnebald). From Rome he went, accompanied by two friends, on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, which extended over seven years, and exposed him to many dangers and adventurous experiences. On his return he spent ten years in monastic retirement at Monte Cassino (729-739). He then accompanied a Spanish priest to Rome, and there, as it would seem, made the acquaintance of Boniface, whose kinsman he was. In 740 he came to Germany, and entered on his apostolic work at Eichstätt. In the same year he was consecrated to the priesthood, and in the following year (Oct. 21 or 22) to the bishopric. In 742 he was present, as bishop of Eichstätt, at a council held by Carloman, duke of the Eastern Franks.

But little is known as respects the details of Willibald's activity. Descriptions of his career speak in general terms of the eradication of heathenism, the subduing of the soil, the maintenance of worship at stated times, the regular preaching of the Gospel, and the multiplication of convents, under the rule of St. Benedict, in his diocese. His brother Wunnebald and his sister Walpurgis came to his assistance, as did other missionaries, and he was thus able to multiply his labors and extend their area. In 765 he attended a synod at Attigny, held by Pepin. He attained to a great age, and outlived most of the pupils and companions of Boniface. Reports of the 11th century fix the date of his death on July 7, 781; but a donation to Fulda, from his hand, is dated 786; and it might accordingly be more nearly correct to suppose that he died in 786 or 787.

The principal source for Willibald's life is the Vita Willibaldi, also entitled Hodeporicum, written by a nun of Heidenheim, who terms herself his kinswoman, and states that she obtained many of the facts she records from his own lips. This Vita was copied in Canisius, Lect. Antig. III, i, 105; Bollandus, Acta SS. July, ii, 301; Mabillon, Acta SS. Ben. iii, 2, 117; and in Falckenstein, Cod. Diplom. Nordgav. p. 445. A second Life is copied in Canisius, ut sup. p. 117; Bollandus, p. 512; and Mabillon, p. 383; which, however, is merely an abridgment of the first. A third Life, which, for no special reason, is usually ascribed to bishop Reginald (died 989), is given by Canisius alone. Abbot Adelbert, of Heidenheim, furnished a brief biography of Willibald, in connection with a historical sketch of his monastery, in the 12th century; and another was drawn up by bishop Philip of Eichstädt in the 14th century, both of which were published in Gretser, De Divis Tutelaribus (Ingolst. 1617). See Rettberg, Kirchengesch. Deutschl. ii, 348 sq.; Wright, Biog. Brit. Literaria (Anglo-Saxon Period), p. 335; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Willibrod (or Willibrord). See WILBRORD, ST.

Willis, Henry, one of the early Methodist preachers in America, was a native of Virginia. He entered the ministry in 1779, and was one of the most dominant spirits of the times, energizing, by his irrepressible ardor, the work of the Church throughout two thirds of its territory. He labored mightily for the West, as if conscious of its prospective importance in the State and the Church. He filled the following stations: Roanoke, 1779; Mecklenburg, 1780; Talbot, 1781; Dorchester, 1782; New Hope, 1783; Holston, 1784. In 1785 he was in charge as presiding elder of a district, comprehending most of North Carolina; 1786, Charleston, S. C.; 1787, New York city; 1788, presiding elder of New York District; 1789, of a district which extended from Philadelphia to Redstone and Pittsburgh; 1790, located; 1791-95, supernumerary in Philadelphia; 1796, he reappears in Baltimore with John Haggerty, Nelson Reed, and other worthies. Here he seems to have remained till 1800, when he became a supernumerary, doing what service he could—mostly on the Frederick Circuit, near his home—till his death, in 1808, near Strawbridge's old church on Pipe Creek. Mr. Willis was naturally of a strong mind, and this he had diligently improved. Quin, who knew him in the Redstone country, describes him as about "six feet in stature, slender, a good English scholar, well read, an eloquent man, mighty in the Scriptures, and a most profound and powerful reasoner. He became feeble in the prime of life, retired from the itinerant field, married, and settled on a farm near Frederick County, Md. The Baltimore Conference sat in his parlor in April, 1801." He was the most endeared to Asbury of all the itinerants of that day. See Minutes of Conferences, 1808, p. 157; Stevens, Hist. of the M. E. Church, ii, 51-53, 134, 298, 347; iii, 17, 287; iv, 240; Bangs, Hist. of the M. E. Church, i, 225; ii, 254. (J. L. S.)

Willis, Michael, D.D., LL.D., a minister of the Scotch Presbyterian Free Church, was born in Scotland in 1798. He was ordained and installed pastor of Renfield Presbyterian Free Church, Glasgow, and labored with great success and usefulness for twenty-five years. In 1847 he received a call from Canada West to the presidency and professorship of theology in Knox College, Toronto. He was well known to English Presbyterians, and took a great interest in everything pertaining to the welfare of the Church. In some respects he was peculiar, was regarded as very eccentric, and was noted for his pungent remarks on the preachers to whom he chanced to listen. Though pointed, his criticisms were not bitter or intended to wound. Fifty-seven years of his life were spent in preaching and teaching. He died at Aberlour, Scotland, in September, 1879. Dr. Willis published a Funeral Sermon, on his father:—A Discourse on Popery (1829):—A Defence of Church Establishments (1833):—A Biography of Two Brothers:—besides several Pamphlets. See Morgan, Celebrated Canadians (Quebec, 1862, 8vo), p. 465. (W. P. S.)

Willis, Richard, D.D., an English bishop, was born in 1663. He became prebendary of Westminster in 1695; prebendary and dean of Lincoln in 1701; bishop of Gloucester Jan. 16, 1714; bishop of Salisbury in 1721; bishop of Winchester in 1723; and died in 1734. He was the author of, The Occasional Paper, in Eight Parts (1697):—Speech in the House of Lords on the Bill against Francis (late), Bishop of Rochester (1723):—and a number of single Sermons.

Willis, Robert, F.R.S., F.G.S., an English clergyman and scientist, was born in London in 1800. He graduated at Caius College, Cambridge, in 1826, and gained a fellowship, which he subsequently vacated; took orders in the Church of England; was early distinguished for his researches in physical science, particularly acoustics and the physics of oral language, the philosophy of mechanism and machinery, and the mathematical and mechanical philosophy of ancient architecture; became a fellow of the Royal Society April 22, 1830; was appointed Jacksonian professor of natural and experimental philosophy at Cambridge in 1837; made a tour of France, Germany, and Italy for the study of architecture in 1832-33; and became a profound architectural historian. He was a member of many scientific associations, before which he delivered many addresses; invented several philosophical instruments; and died at Cambridge, Feb. 28, 1875. As a lecturer in his own department he was unrivalled. He was the author of numerous works on scientific subjects, among which may be mentioned, Remarks on the Architecture of the Middle Ages, Especially of Italy (1835):—Report of a Survey of the Dilapidated Portions of Hereford Cathedral in the Year 1841:—Principles of Mechanism for Students (1841):—Architectural History of Canterbury Cathedral (1845):—Architectural History of Winchester Cathedral (ed.) :—A Architectural History of York Cathedral (1846):—Architectural History of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem (1849):—and Architectural History of Glastonbury Abbey (1866).

Willis, Thomas, D.D., an English clergyman of the 17th century. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; became minister of Kingston-upon-Thames, in Surrey, about 1667; and died in 1692. He published, The Key to Knowledge:—and several single Sermons (1659-76).

Williston, Seth, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Suffield, Conn., April 4, 1770. He studied at Dartmouth College, where he graduated in 1791. Having applied himself to the study of theology, he was licensed to preach Oct. 7, 1794, and was afterwards employed for some months in supplying, temporarily, several churches in Connecticut. After several years spent as a missionary in Vermont and New York, he was finally, in 1803, installed pastor of the Church of Lisle, N. Y., which he had, however, supplied for the preceding three or four years. Having in July, 1810, become pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Durham, he remained there eighteen years, when he received a dismission, at his own request, Dec. 22, 1828; and during the rest of his life he preached at various places, chiefly in New York state. After a life remarkable for earnestness and activity, he died at Guilford Centre, Chenango Co., N. Y., March 2, 1851. Dr. Williston published the following volumes: An Address to Parents (1799):—Sermons on Doctrinal and Experimental Religion (1813):—A Vindication of Some of the Most Essential Doctrines of the Reformation (1817):—

Sermons on the Mystery of the Incarnation, etc. (1823):—Sermons Adapted to Revivals (1828):—Harmony of Divine Truth (1836):—Discourses on the Temptations of Christ (1837):—Christ's Kingdom, Not of this World (1843), three discourses:—Lectures on the Moral Imperfection of Christians (1846):—Millennial Discourses (1848):—and a number of Pamphlets. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 141.

Willow is the rendering, in the A. V., of the two following Heb. words:

1. עֵרֶב, éreb (only in the plur. עֵרָבִים, Sept. iria, ἄρνος), is apparently a generic term for the willow, like the Arabic gharab. Willows are mentioned in Lev. xxiii, 40, among the trees whose branches were to be used in the construction of booths at the Feast of Tabernacles; in Job xl, 22, as a tree which gave shade to Behemoth ("the hippopotamus"); in Isa. xlv, 4, where it is said that Israel's offspring should spring up "as willows by the watercourses;" in the Psalm (cxxxvii, 2) which so beautifully represents Israel's sorrow during the time of the Captivity in Babylon—"We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof." With respect to the tree upon which the captive Israelites hung their harps, there can be no doubt that the weeping willow (Salix Babylonica) is intended. This tree grows abundantly on the banks of the Euphrates, in other parts of Asia as in Palestine (Strand, Flora Palest. No. 556), and also in North Africa. Bochart has endeavored to show (Phaleg, I, viii) that the same country is spoken of, in Isa. xv, 7, as "the Valley of Willows." This, however, is very doubtful. Sprengel (Hist. Rei Herb. i, 18, 270) seems to restrict the éreb to the Salix Babylonica; but there can scarcely be a doubt that the term is generic, and includes other species of the large family of Salices, which is probably well represented in Palestine and other Bible lands, such as the Salix alba, S. viminalis (osier), S. Egyptiaca, which latter plant, however, Sprengel identifies with the safsáf of Abul'fadhli, cited by Celsius (Hierob. ii, 108); but this latter word is probably the same as—

2. טַפְּסָפָה, tsaphtapháh, which occurs only in Ezek. xvii, 5, "He took also of the seed of the land, and planted it in a fruitful field; he placed it by great waters, and set it as a willow-tree." Celsius, however, thinks that the word means locus planus, planities, although he at the same time gives all the evidence for the willow. First, the rabbins consider it to mean a tree, "et quidem salix;" R. Ben Melech says it is "species salicis, Arabibus tziftzaph dicta;" while "Avicenna hoc tit. dicit tziftzaph esse chilaf." Travellers also give us similar information. Thus Paul Lucas: "Les Arabes le nomment sofsaf, qui signifie en Arabe saule." Rauwolf (Travels, i, 9), speaking of the plants he found near Aleppo, remarks, "There is also a peculiar sort of willow-trees called safsáf, etc.; the stems and twigs are long, thin, weak, and of a pale-yellow color; on their twigs here and there are shoots of a span long, like unto the Cypriotish wild fig-trees, which put forth in the spring tender and woolly flowers like unto the blossoms of the poplar-tree, only they are of a more drying quality, of a pale color, and a fragrant smell. The inhabitants pull of these great quantities, and distil a very precious and sweet water out of them." This practice is still continued in Eastern countries as far as Northern India, and was, and probably still is, well known in Egypt. Hasselquist (Trav. p. 499), under the name of calaf, apparently speaks of the same tree; and Forskål (Descript. Plant. p. lxxvi) identifies it with the Salix Egyptiaca, while he considers the safsáf to be the S. Babylonica.

Various uses were no doubt made of willows by the ancient Hebrews, although there does not appear to be any definite allusion to them. The Egyptians used "flat baskets of wickerwork, similar to those made in Cairo at the present day" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i, 43). Herodotus (l. 194) speaks of boats at Babylon whose framework was of willow; such coracle-shaped boats are represented in the Nineveh sculptures (see Rawlinson, Herod. i, 268).

Of Biblical willows by far the most interesting is the weeping willow, or willow of Babylon (S. Babylonica). With its long lanceolate, finely serrated, and pointed leaves, with its smooth, slender, purplish, drooping branches, it has in all modern times been the symbol of sorrow. Before the Babylonian Captivity the willow was always associated with feelings of joyful prosperity. "It is remarkable," as Mr. Johns (Forest Trees of Britain, ii, 240) truly says, "for having been in different ages emblematical of two directly opposite feelings—at one time being associated with the palm, at another with the cypress." After the Captivity, however, this tree became the emblem of sorrow, and is frequently thus alluded to in the poetry of our own country; and "there can be no doubt," as Mr. Johns continues, "that the dedication of the tree to sorrow is to be traced to the pathetic passage in the Psalms." "The children of Israel," says lady Callcott (Scripture Herbal, p. 533), "still present willows annually in their synagogues, bound up with palm and myrtle, and accompanied with a citron."

Wills. The subject of testamentary disposition is, of course, intimately connected with that of inheritance, and little need be added here to what will be found there. See HEIR. Under a system of close inheritance like that of the Jews, the scope for bequest in respect of land was limited by the right of redemption and general re-entry in the Jubilee year. See JUBILEE; Vow. But the law does not forbid bequests by will of such limited interest in land as was consistent with those rights. The case of houses in walled towns was different, and there can be no doubt that they must, in fact, have frequently been bequeathed by will (Lev. xxv, 30). Two instances are recorded in the Old Testament, under the law, of testamentary disposition—1. Effected in the case of Ahithophel (2 Sam. xvii, 23); 2. Recommended in the case of Hezekiah (2 Kings xx, 1; Isa. xxxviii, 1); and it may be remarked in both that the word "set in order" (עָרַךְ; Sept. ἐντάλλομαι; Vulg. dispono. עָרַךְ in Rabbinic is a will. See Gesen. The-saur. p. 1155), marg. "give charge concerning," agrees with the Arabic word "command," which also means "make a will" (Michaelis, Laws of Moses, art. 80). Various directions concerning wills will be found in the Mishna, which imply disposition of land (Baba Bathr. viii, 6, 7). See TESTAMENT.

Willson, James McLeod, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian divine, and son of the distinguished divine Rev. James R. Willson, D.D., was born at the Forks of Yough, near Elizabeth, Allegheny Co., Pa., Nov. 17, 1809. From childhood he was apt in the acquisition of learning, and diligent in his studies. His preparatory education was prosecuted under his father's instruction. "So thorough had been his previous training, and so advanced his scholarship, that on entering college he took high rank at once in the senior class." He graduated at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in 1829; then spent some years in teaching, first in an academy at Belair, Md., then at the village of Scho-dack, N. Y., and lastly as principal of the High-school in Troy, N. Y.; studied theology until 1834, when he was licensed to preach by the then Southern Presbytery; and ordained and installed pastor of a church in Philadelphia, Pa., Nov. 27, 1834, where he labored with great success until 1862. In 1859 he was appointed by the Synod to a professorship in the Theological Seminary, Allegheny City, Pa., a position for which he was eminently qualified, and which he filled with great industry and zeal for three successive seasons, while still retaining his pastoral relation to his congregation. In 1862, his pastoral relation was dissolved, and he removed to Allegheny, where he continued to perform the duties of his professorship, until the day of his death, Aug. 31, 1866. Coincident with his pastoral and professional duties, he performed an amount of other work equal to the whole power of a man of ordinary gifts. For more than seventeen years he was sole editor of the Covenant, an ably conducted and efficient monthly, and co-editor with Dr. Thomas Sproull for four years more after its union with the Reformed Presbyterian. He was also the author of several treatises, viz., The Deacon (1840);—Bible Magistracy;—Civil Government;—also a little treatise on Psalmody. Dr. Willson was a diligent, kind, and faithful pastor; a plain, logical, and eminently instructive preacher; a successful editor and author; a distinguished theological professor. His controversial powers were of a high order; his knowledge of history was both extensive and accurate. In the Theological Seminary he was in his element. He was an "Israelite indeed, in whom was no guile." His whole life gave evidence of this. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 387.

Willson, James Renwick, D.D., one of the most learned, able, and eloquent divines of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in his day, was born near Pittsburgh, Pa., April 9, 1780. He early gave indications of great mental ability, and, when only twelve years of age, was well known as an eager student of theology. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., with first honors, in 1806; was licensed to preach in 1807; and was principal of Bedford, Pa., 1806–15, and of a classical school in Philadelphia for two and a half years. His labors as a teacher were highly successful, some of the most prominent gentlemen of the country having been trained by him. In 1817 he became pastor of the congregations of Newburgh and Coldenham, N. Y. At that time Newburgh was notorious for its infidelity; but his advent was a new era in the village. The town collected to hear him; it was gradually reformed, and the oldest inhabitants still ascribe very much to his sermons. In 1823 the congregation of Coldenham asked and received all his services until 1830, when he removed to Albany, as pastor of a church there. As early as 1820 he began educating young men for the ministry; in 1822 he began to edit the Evangelical Witness, a monthly magazine, the first ever published by a Covenanter as a distinctive denominational magazine: it was discontinued in 1826. He afterwards commenced and continued for two years The Christian Statesman, a small paper, 8vo, of eight pages. In 1831, about the time when the abolition movement began, and also a movement within the Reformed Presbyterian Church respecting certain national privileges, he took a leading part in all this conflict, and from its earlier appearance had begun the publication of The Albany Quarterly. From 1840 until 1845 he was senior professor in the Reformed Presbyterian Seminary, Allegheny, Pa.; from 1845, when the Seminary was removed to Cincinnati, O., he was sole professor until 1851, when, owing to ill-health, he retired with the title of emeritus professor. He died Sept. 29, 1858. Dr. Willson, in intellectual reach, and comprehension and acuteness, ranked among the first of men. He had a wide-spread reputation as an eloquent preacher. There were moments when he was overwhelming in the majesty of his descriptions and in the awful character of his denunciations. He was pre-eminently a man of prayer; faithful to his convictions; a man of unwavering integrity. He published, A Historical Sketch of Opinions on the Atonement, etc. (1817);—Alphabetical Writing and Printing (1826);—Prince Messiah's Claim to Dominion, etc. (Albany, 1832, 8vo);—The Written Law (1840);—also a number of occasional sermons, addresses, etc. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 293; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ix, 40. (J. L. S.)

Willymott, WILLIAM, LL.D., an English clergyman, was born at Royston about 1675. He was admitted a scholar at King's College, Cambridge, in 1692; became usher at Eton; was tutor in King's College; became rector of Milton in 1735; and died in 1737. He published numerous school-books, and Collection of Devotions for the Altar, etc. (1720). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict., s. v.

Wilmer, WILLIAM H., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Kent County, Md., Oct. 29, 1782. He graduated at Washington College, Md., and immediately engaged in mercantile pursuits, but eventually abandoned them to study theology. In 1808 he was ordained, and then appointed to Chester Parish, Md. The convention of the diocese named him one of the standing committee in 1811. The following year he received a call to St. Paul's Church, Alexandria, Va., and, after his removal to this charge, became one of the standing committee of the diocese of Virginia. He was one of the originators in 1818 of the Education Society of the District of Columbia, designed to aid theological students at the seminary in Fairfax County. Until his removal from Alexandria he was president of this association. When St. John's Church in Washington, D. C., was erected in 1816 he was chosen its first minister, but did not accept the office, though he supplied the Church until a rector was secured. Of the Washington Theological Repository, a periodical begun in 1819, he was one of the editors until 1826. After removing to Virginia, until the close of his life, he was a delegate of every general convention; and was president of the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies in 1820, 1821, 1823, and 1826. When the Theological Seminary of Virginia opened its sessions in Alexandria in 1823, he became professor of systematic theology, ecclesiastical history, and church polity. In the spring of 1826 he was chosen assistant rector to bishop Moore, in the Monumental Church at Richmond, Va., but was induced by the friends of the seminary to decline the call. A few months after, however, he was elected president of William and Mary College, and rector of the Church at Williamsburg. Before the expiration of a year from the time of his entrance upon these duties he died there July 24, 1827. His preaching was characterized by great simplicity; and although his manner was not considered oratorical, it was fervent. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 515.

Wilna, ELIJAH, also called the Pious (החסיד), was born in 1720 at Selz, near Brisk, in Poland. His natural endowments were so extraordinary that when eleven years of age he was not only a thorough Hebraist, but unravelled the mysteries of the Cabala, and was master of astronomy, geometry, grammar, etc.; and at the age of thirteen (1733) was appealed to as a great authority and teacher. In addition to his marvellous native powers, he possessed a real love of learning and great assiduity, as well as an independent fortune, and lived till 1797. Like Mendelssohn and Wessely, Wilna was laboring to produce a reformation in Poland with the special purpose to check the mischief wrought in the Jewish community by the Chasidim, who at his time had become very powerful. Wilna's writings are very numerous. Up to the year 1760 he had written the prodigious number of sixty volumes, of which fifty-four appeared between 1802 and 1854. We mention the following: Commentary on the Order Zeraim (Lemberg, 1797, and often; last ed. Stettin, 1860);—Commentary on the Order Toharoth (Brünn, 1802, and often; last ed. Stettin, 1860);—Text-critical Glosses on the Mechilta (Wilna, 1844);—Critical Notes on the Babylonian Talmud (Vienna, 1807, and often);—Critical Notes on the Pirke de R. Elieser (Warsaw, 1854);—Critical Notes on the Pesikta (Breslau, 1831);—Scholia to the Greater and Lesser Seder Olam (Wilna, 1845);—Glosses on the Thirty-two Hermeneutical Rules of R. Josi (Sklow, 1803);—The Mantle of Elijah, a commentary on the Pentateuch (first printed in the Pentateuch edition published at Dobrowna, 1804, and again at Halberstadt, 1859-60);—A Commentary on Isa. i-zii and Habakkuk (Wilna, 1820; 2d ed. ibid. 1843, edited and supplemented by his grandson Jacob Moses of Slonim);—A Commentary on Jonah (ibid. 1800);—A Commentary on Proverbs (Sklow, 1798, and often);—A Commentary on Job i-vi (Warsaw, 1854);—A Commentary on the Song of Songs (Prague, 1811; Warsaw, 1842);—A Commentary on the Chronicles (Wilna, 1820; 2d ed. ibid. 1843);—A Commentary on the Book Jezira (Grodno, 1806);—A Commentary on the Zohar (Wilna, 1810);—A Hebrew Grammar (ibid. 1833);—A Topographical Description of Palestine, and a Treatise on the Solomonian Temple (Sklow, 1802, and often);—A Commentary on the Third or Ezekiel's Temple (Berlin, 1822). See Fürst, Bibl. Jur. iii, 516-521; Jost, Gesch. d. Juden u. s. Sekten, iii, 248 sq.; Kittó, Cyclop. s. v.; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, xi, 118 sq.; Heichel, ספרי אלהים (Wilna, 1856); Finn, קריית נאמנה (containing a history of the congregation of Wilna, biographies of its rabbins, etc. [ibid. 1860]), p. 133 sq. (B. P.)

Wilson, Adam, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Topham, Me., Feb. 3, 1794. He was a graduate of Bowdoin College in the class of 1819, and during his freshman year he joined the newly constituted Baptist Church in his native town. He studied theology with Rev. Dr. Stoughton, of Philadelphia, and was ordained in 1820. After preaching some months he was settled as pastor at Wiscasset, Me. His special vocation seemed to be rather as a stated supply of churches, and in this capacity he acted for a number of years. A new denominational paper having been started in Portland, Me., the Zion's Advocate, he became its editor and proprietor, conducting it with marked ability, and making it exceedingly useful in promoting the interests of the Baptist denomination in his native state. The last years of his life were spent in Waterville, Me., of the college in which place he was a trustee for forty years. His death occurred at Waterville, Jan. 16, 1871. "A man of energy and industry, of decided character and marked wisdom and discretion, and of genial disposition, he ever had the respect, confidence, and affection of the communion whose interests he espoused, and was eminently a good man." See Necrology of Bowdoin College. (J. C. S.)

Wilson, Bird, D.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Carlyle, Pa., in 1777. He graduated at Philadelphia College in 1792; studied law, and became president-judge of the Court of Common Pleas for the seventh Circuit of Pennsylvania in 1802; was ordained deacon in the Protestant Episcopal Church in 1819; was rector of St. John's Church, Norristown, Pa., from 1819 to 1821; professor of systematic divinity in the Episcopal General Theological Seminary in New York from 1821 to 1850, and emeritus professor from 1850 until his death, April 14, 1859. He published Memoirs of the Life of the Right Rev. William White, Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Pennsylvania, and edited Abridgment of the Law, by Matthew Bacon (1811-13), and the Works of the Hon. James Wilson, LL.D. (1803-4). See a Memorial (1864) by W. White Bronson.

Wilson, Christopher, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1714; became prebendary of London in 1745, of Westminster in 1748, and bishop of Bristol in 1783. He died in 1792. His publications consist of a few single sermons.

Wilson, Daniel, D.D., a colonial bishop of the Church of England, was born in Spitalfields, London, in 1778. Destined by his parents for trade, he was apprenticed at fourteen to his uncle, a silk merchant. He was then a giddy boy; but in 1797 he was converted, and determined to abandon trade. In 1798 he entered St. Edward's Hall, Oxford, where he graduated A.B. in 1802, and A.M. in 1804. He had previously been ordained in 1801, and began his ministry in that year as curate to Mr. Cecil in Chobham. "In 1803 he was appointed to a tutorship at Oxford, where he remained for about eight years and a half, during which time he was first curate of Worton, and then of St. John's Chapel, London, where he remained until the year 1824. He then became vicar of Islington, discharging the duties of that office until 1832, when, on the death of Dr. Turner, bishop of Calcutta, he was appointed his successor, and from that time to his death, in 1858, he was devoted to the arduous and indefatigable labors for the promotion of Christianity in India, which have made his name conspicuous in the history of missions. Bishop Wilson was a man of studious habits and solid learning, with little respect for forms or ceremonies, compared with inward experience; destitute of the elegant culture and graceful address of Heber, one of his most distinguished predecessors, he was stern in purpose and explicit in speech. His energy in the discharge of duty was almost without a parallel. Social in his disposition, fond of conversation, and exercising a generous hospitality, he appears to have had few attachments and intimacies. Free from worldliness, from every trace of self-indulgence, from all duplicity and guile, he found his highest glory in the progress of the faith; and in his zeal, courage, firmness, and self-devotion, must be regarded as a model of the missionary bishop." In theology he belonged to the evangelical party of the Church of England—the earnest school of Newton, Hill, and Cecil. He died at Calcutta, Jan. 2, 1858. A copious biography is furnished in Bateman's Life of Bishop Wilson (Lond. 1860, 2 vols. 8vo; Boston, 1860, 8vo). Besides occasional sermons, charges, etc., he published Sermons (5th ed. ibid. 1826, 8vo):—Evidences of Christianity (4th ed. ibid. 1841, 2 vols. 12mo):—Divine Authority of the Lord's Day (ibid. 1831, 12mo; 3d ed. 1840):—Sermons Preached in India (ibid. 1838, 8vo):—Lectures on Colossians (ibid. 1845, 8vo):—Tour on the Continent (1825, 2 vols. 8vo). See Life, by Bateman; London Rev. July, 1860, p. 470; Amer. Ch. Rev. 1858, ii, 177.

Wilson, Henry Rowan, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born near Gettysburg, Adams Co., Pa., Aug. 7, 1780. He pursued his preparatory course in a classical school in the neighborhood; graduated at Dickinson College in 1798; studied theology privately; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Carlisle in 1801; and was ordained and installed pastor of the congregations at Bellefont and at Lick Run, Centre Co., Pa., in 1802. In 1806 he was called to the professorship of languages in Dickinson College, which position he held for ten years, until he became pastor of the Church at Silver Spring in 1816. In May, 1824, he was installed pastor of the Church in Shippensburg; in 1838 he accepted the general agency of the Board of Publication in the Presbyterian Church; in 1842 he became pastor of the Church at Neshaminy, Hartsville, Bucks Co., Pa., where he continued till October, 1848, when, at his own request, the pastoral relation was dissolved. He died March 22, 1849. Dr. Wilson was a man of strong mind; an able, energetic, and popular preacher; "his record is on high." See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 300; Nevin, Churches of the Valley. (J. L. S.)

Wilson, Hugh Nesbitt, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Elizabeth, N. J., May 7, 1813. He early felt the power of religion and united with the Second Presbyterian Church of Elizabeth at about fifteen years of age. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in the class of 1830, and, after teaching for a short time in Trenton, N. J., entered Princeton Theological Seminary, where, after taking a full course of study, he graduated in 1834. During the years 1833-35, he held the place of tutor in the college. As an instructor, he was faithful, thorough, and able. His manners were gentle, winning, and most agreeable, and he always commanded the unbounded respect as well as the affection of the students. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Elizabethtown, April 23, 1835, and ordained as an evangelist by the same presbytery Oct. 7, in the same year. His first field of labor was on Long Island, where he began to supply the Church at Southampton in September, 1835, but soon after he received and accepted a call to become its pastor, and was installed June 29, 1836. Here he had a long, useful, and happy pastorate of nearly sixteen years. His labors were largely blessed in gathering many souls into the Church, and he enjoyed the unbounded love of an attached people. For reasons connected with his health he resigned his charge April 13, 1852, and was immediately afterwards settled at Hackettstown, N. J. There he was installed June 23, 1852, and labored six years with great acceptance: but, having received a call to the Second Reformed (Dutch) Church of New Brunswick, N. J., he resigned his charge at Hackettstown May 1, 1858, and was installed at New Brunswick May 27, in the same year. After laboring at the latter place four years, he resigned this charge in May, 1862. It is not often that a minister is invited back in later life to serve the congregation which enjoyed his first ministrations. This happened to Dr. Wilson. After leaving New Brunswick, he was invited to supply for a time the Church at Southampton, which he began to do in August, 1863. In the next year he received a regular call, and was again installed as pastor on Sept. 25, 1864. But, after three years, his health, which had for a long time been far from strong, hopelessly failed, and he resigned May 1, 1867, and in June of the same year he removed to Germantown, near Philadelphia. Here, in an extremely infirm and disabled condition, but patient and trustful, he continued to reside until his death, which occurred June 4, 1878. Dr. Wilson was a director in Princeton Seminary from 1851 until he resigned in 1858, on entering another denomination. He was, in the truest sense of the word, a Christian gentleman; was a fine classical scholar and a man of extensive reading. As a preacher, he was earnest, affectionate, instructive, and popular. The blessing of God attended his labors in every place where he was settled. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church, a. v. (W. P. S.)

Wilson, James, D.D., a bishop of the Church of Ireland, was a native of Dublin, and a student of Trinity College, from which he received his degree of A.M. in 1809. He occupied the post of examining chaplain to Dr. Whately, archbishop of Dublin, and was consecrated bishop of Cork in 1848. He died at Cork, Jan. 5, 1857, aged seventy-five years. His title at the time of his death was bishop of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1857, p. 149.

Wilson, James Patriot, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Lewes, Sussex Co., Del., Feb. 21, 1769. He graduated with high honor at the University of Pennsylvania in August, 1788; was admitted to the bar in 1790; licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Leves in 1804, and in the same year was ordained and installed as pastor of the united congregations of Lewes, Cool Spring, and Indian River. In 1806 he accepted the pastoral charge of the First Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, where he remained until he resigned in 1830. He died Dec. 9, 1830. Dr. Wilson was a profound thinker and a learned preacher of the Gospel. He published, Lectures upon Some of the Parables and Historical Passages of the New Test. (1810, 8vo);—An Easy Introduction to Hebrew (Phila. 1812, 8vo; 1817, 8vo);—An Essay on Grammar (1817, 8vo; Lond. 1840, 18mo);—Common Objections to Christianity (Phila. 1829, 12mo);—The Hope of Immortality (1829, 12mo);—A Free Conversation on the Unpardonable Sin (1830);—The Primitive Government of Christian Churches;—Liturgical Considerations (1833);—also many single sermons and pamphlets. He edited Sermons of the Rev. John Ewing, D.D., with a Life (Easton, 1812, 8vo);—Ridgley's Body of Divinity, with Notes (1814). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 353; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Analect. Mag. xi, 177. (J. L. S.)

Wilson, John, D.D., a missionary of the Scotch Free Church to Bombay. Though not so widely known as Dr. Duff, he was a kindred spirit. His influence had become very great in India, where he spent forty-eight years of missionary toil. While at home a short time, he was made moderator of the General Assembly, and men rose up everywhere to do him honor. He returned to India and assumed his labors, continuing in vigorous health until a few months before his death, which occurred in Bombay in 1875. See Presbyterian, Jan. 1, 1876. (W. P. S.)

Wilson, John Makemie, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born in Mecklenburg County, N. C., in 1769. He graduated with the highest honor at Hampden Sidney College in 1791; studied theology privately under the direction of the Rev. James Hall, D.D.; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Orange, N. C., in 1793, and immediately after was sent by the Commission of Synod on a missionary tour through the counties in the lower part of the state. He was ordained in 1795, and continued in this mission work until 1801, when he accepted a call from the congregations of Rocky River and Philadelphia. In 1812 he opened a school especially for the accommodation of the young men of his charge who wished to devote themselves to the ministry; this school he continued for about twelve years, and twenty-five of his pupils became ministers of the Gospel. He died July 30, 1831. Dr. Wilson possessed a strong, penetrating, and well-cultivated mind. As a member of the judicatories of the Church, no man of his day was held in higher repute. He preached the Gospel with great fidelity and fervency, and with strong faith in the spirit of God to give it effect. He published, a Sermon (1804);—Sermon (1811);—and an Appendix to a work on psalmody by the Rev. Dr. Ruffner, of Virginia. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 90; Foote, Sketches of North Carolina; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (J. L. S.)

Wilson, Joshua Lacy, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born in Bedford County, Va., Sept. 22, 1774, and in the fall of 1781 removed to the neighborhood of Danville, Ky., with his mother and stepfather, John Templin, father of Terah Templin. He was brought up to the trade of a blacksmith, and had no education beyond what his mother gave him till he was twenty-two years old. At that period he was converted. He soon after commenced the study of law, but abandoned it for theology; was licensed to preach in 1802, and in 1804 was ordained pastor of Bardstown and Big Spring churches, Ky. In 1805 he sat as a member of the Commission of Synod in the Cumberland difficulties. In 1808 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati, where he remained for thirty-eight years, part of the time teaching a classical school. In the great controversy which divided the Presbyterian Church in 1837 he bore an active and prominent part. He died Aug. 14, 1846. Dr. Wilson was a self-educated man, of unbending integrity, candor, and conscientiousness. For thirty-eight years he was at the head of every social, moral, and intellectual enterprise of the day in Cincinnati, and to his personal influence Cincinnati College is largely indebted for its existence and prosperity. He published, Episcopal Methodism, or Dagonism Exhibited (1811), and a number of sermons and theological pamphlets. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 308; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Davidson, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Kentucky, p. 364-366. (J. L. S.)

Wilson, Matthew, D.D., eminent as a Presbyterian divine, a physician, and a teacher, was born in Chester County, Pa., Jan. 15, 1731. He received his education in an academy in New London, Pa., studied theology privately, was licensed to preach in April, 1754, ordained in October, 1755, and installed pastor of the congregations at Lewes and Cool Spring, Del., in April, 1756. He was regularly bred to the medical profession, and few physicians of his day manifested more medical skill and learning. He died March 30, 1790. Dr. Wilson was an instructive and persuasive preacher; learned, pious, patriotic, and benevolent in an eminent degree. He contributed medical papers to Aitken's Amer. Mag. 1775, and Carey's Amer. Mus. vol. iv, and Observations on the Winter of 1779-80 to Trans. Amer. Soc. vol. iii; and left prepared for the press (never published) A Therapeutic Alphabet. See Thacher, Amer. Med. Biog. ii, 197; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 178; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (J. L. S.)

Wilson, Robert G., D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born in Lincoln County, N. C., Dec. 30, 1768. He pursued his preparatory studies at an academy in Salisbury, N. C.; graduated at Dickinson College in 1790; studied theology privately; was licensed to preach April 16, 1793, by the Presbytery of South Carolina; and was ordained and installed pastor of Upper Long Cane Church, in Abbeville District, May 22, 1794. He was offered a professorship in South Carolina College, and was also invited to become principal of an academy in Augusta, Ga.; but he declined these offers, and accepted, in 1805, a call to become pastor of a small Church, then lately organized, in Chillicothe, O., where he remained nineteen years, greatly beloved by his people and signally blessed in his labors. In 1824 he resigned his charge by advice of the presbytery, and accepted an invitation to the presidency of the Ohio University, at Athens, over which he continued to preside until 1839, when, on account of the increasing infirmities of age, he resigned the office, returned to Chillicothe, and engaged to preach as a stated supply for the Union Church. He died April 17, 1851. Dr. Wilson was an instructive preacher. He excelled as a member of the judicatories of the Church. In no situation, however, in which he was placed were the energies of his mind brought into more vigorous and effective exercise than in the presidency of Ohio University. When he entered upon that office, the institution was greatly depressed; but he gave to it the whole power of his vigorous mind, and his success was indicated within a few years by a very considerable increase of both funds and students. He published, three single sermons (1817, 1828, 1829);—a sermon in the Presb. Preacher (1833);—and an Address to the Graduating Class of Ohio University (1836). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 122; Foote, Sketches of North Carolina; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (J. L. S.)

Wilson, Sir Thomas (1), LL.D., a statesman and divine of the reign of queen Elizabeth, was born at Stroby, in Lincolnshire, about 1524. He was educated at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1546. He took orders in the Church of England; became tutor to the two sons of Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, by Mary, ex-queen of France, but both of his pupils soon died; withdrew to the Continent on the accession of queen Mary, in 1553; was imprisoned by the Inquisition at Rome on account of heresies alleged to be contained in his Logic and Rhetoric, and was put to the torture; obtained his liberty at the death of pope Paul IV in 1555, in consequence of a fire which caused the populace to break open the doors and allow the prisoners to escape; returned to England and became private secretary to queen Elizabeth in 1558; was appointed one of the masters of requests, and master of St. Katherine's Hospital, near the Tower; went as envoy to the Netherlands in 1576; became secretary of state and colleague of Sir Thomas Walsingham in 1577; was made dean of Durham in 1579; and died in London, June 16, 1581. He published a Latin Biography of his two pupils, Henry and Charles Brandon (1551):—The Rule of Reason, Containyng the Arte of Logique set forth in Englishe (eod.):—The Arte of Rhetorike, for the Use of all Suche as are Studious of Eloquence (1558):—The Three Orationes of Demosthenes, etc. (1570):—and A Discourse upon Usury by Waye of Dialogue and Orations, etc. (1572). See Strype, Annals; and Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Wilson, Thomas (2), D.D., LL.D., a Church of England divine, was born at Burton, Cheshire, Dec. 20, 1663. Little is known of his early life. He was educated at Chester and at Trinity College, Dublin, quitting the university in 1686, and receiving an appointment to Winwick, Lancashire. In 1692 he was ordained priest, and became domestic chaplain to the earl of Derby, and tutor to his son; and in 1796 entered upon his duties as bishop of Sodor and Man, in which he remained faithful till death, 1755. Bishop Wilson was remarkable for his humility, his conscientiousness, and his devotedness to Christian duty. He was a man of prayer and deep piety. See Christian Observer, 1820, p. 569, 713, 785; Church of England Magazine, 1836, p. 245; and Christian Remembrancer, 1829, p. 729.

Wilson, Thomas (3), D.D., an English divine, son of bishop Thomas, was born at Kirk Michael, in the Isle of Man, Aug. 24, 1703. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated A.M., Dec. 16, 1727; became prebendary of Westminster in 1743; was forty-six years rector of St. Stephen's, Wallbrook; and died at Alford House, Bath, April 15, 1784. He published, Distilled Liquors the Bone of the Nation:—Review of the Project for Building a New Square at Westminster (1757):—The Ornaments of the Churches Considered, etc. (1716).

Wimpina, KONRAD (really Koch; for he adopted the name Wimpina from the town of Wimpfen, his father's native place), a scholastic theologian and defender of Tetzel, the indulgence peddler, was born at Buchen, or Buchheim, in the Oden forest, A.D. 1459 or 1460. He was educated at Leipsic, and held a professorship in that university. In 1502 he became licentiate, and in 1503 doctor of theology. Envy charged him with holding heterodox views at this time, but he succeeded in repelling the charge before the archbishop of Magdeburg. In 1505 he, in his turn, assailed Martin Polichius with a charge of heterodoxy, because that writer had characterized scholastic speculations as useless, and had recommended philological studies as possessing a higher value for theology. Wimpina was associated with the founding of the University of Wittenberg, and immediately afterwards was made professor of theology and rector in the University of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. On Luther's promulgation of his theses against indulgences, Wimpina assumed the defence of Tetzel. Two dispu-tations in Tetzel's favor appeared in 1517, which were generally credited to Wimpina, and which were chiefly remarkable as postulating a distinction between punitive and reformatory punishments in connection with the theory of indulgences. In 1530 Wimpina attended the Diet at Augsburg, in the character of associate author of the Confutation of the Augsburg Confession, and also as a member of the commission appointed to effect a reconciliation of parties with respect to points in dispute. He died, either May 17 or June 16, 1531, in the monastery of Amorbach.

Wimple is the rendering, in the A. V. at Isa. iii, 22, of the Heb. מִטְפָּחַח, mitpáchach (from מִטַּח, to spread out; Sept. translates undistinguishably; Vulg. linteramenta), which is translated "veil" in Ruth iii, 15, but it signifies rather a kind of shawl or mantle (Schröder, De Vestitu Mulier. Hebr. c. 16). The old English and now obsolete term means a kind of hood or veil in use at the time the translation was made, and was not a bad representative of the original. The word occurs in Spenser:

"For she had laid her mournful stole aside,
And widow-like sad wimple thrown away."

"But (she) the same did hide
Under a veil that wimpled was full low;
And over all a black stole she did throw,
As one that fully mourned."

See VEIL.

WIMPLE, in ecclesiastical phrase, is a name for a hood or veil, especially the white linen cloth bound about the forehead, and covering the necks of nuns (q. v.).

Wimr, in Norse mythology, is the river through which Thor waded when he journeyed towards Geirrodsgard. The daughter of the giant made its waters so high that they reached to his neck.

Winchelsey, ROBERT, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Winchelsea, and educated at Canterbury. From Canterbury School he proceeded to Paris, and there his success was remarkable. At an early age he received his degree of A.M., and soon after was appointed rector of the university. On his return to England he became a member of Merton College, Oxford. In 1288 he was appointed chancellor of Oxford. He was also appointed archdeacon of Essex. He was translated to Canterbury in 1293, and enthroned in grand style by Henry, prior of his church at Canterbury, in 1295. It seems that of all the primates of all England, none was ever so unpopular as archbishop Robert. He was so self-willed and haughty that he placed himself, as it were, in opposition to the country just when the nation was rising to national independence. He was so unscrupulous in the means he adopted and the measures he proposed that he at length involved himself in the guilt of high-treason. Towards the close of his life, he divided his time between Oxford and Canterbury. "Whatever may have been said of his faults as a public character—and they were many and great—all his contemporaries bear testimony to his worth in private life." He exercised boundless charities to the poor, and their gratitude invested him with the character of a saint. He died at Oxford, May 11, 1313. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, iii, 368 sq.

Winchester, Elhanan, a Universalist minister, was born at Brookline, Mass., Sept. 30, 1751. He was of Welsh descent, the son of a respectable and industrious mechanic, the eldest of a family of fifteen children; was very precocious, naturally of a feeble constitution, and remarkably amiable; received a careful religious training and excellent educational privileges; joined the Baptists in 1769, united in marriage the same year, and soon after began his ministerial career. In 1771 he preached at Rehoboth, Mass., where his youth, extraordinary memory, eloquence, apparent zeal, and singular dress excited interest and drew multitudes to his meetings. His subsequent appointments were: Grafton, 1772; Hull, 1773-74; Welch Neck, S. C., 1775-79, meanwhile travelling and preaching extensively every summer in the Middle and Eastern States; Philadelphia, Pa., 1780, where and when he accepted the Restoration theory. He sailed to England in 1787, and continued his journeys in Europe until about 1795, when he returned to Philadelphia. He died of hemorrhage of the lungs in Hartford, Conn., April 18, 1797. Mr. Winchester was gentle and zealous in temperament; diligent and faithful by habit; exemplary in life; a thoroughly scriptural and evangelical and unusually fascinating preacher; and a voluminous, clear, captivating writer. His writings embrace, A Collection of Hymns (1784);—A Serious Address to Youth on the Worth of the Soul (1785);—Dialogues on Universal Restoration (1788);—Lectures on the Prophecies (1790-91, 2 vols. 8vo);—The Process and Empire of Christ, a Poem (1793);—Ten Letters to Thomas Paine, in Reply to his Age of Reason (1794);—Political Catechism;—Hymns on the Restoration (1795);—besides many sermons. See Stone, Biography of Rev. Elhanan Winchester (Boston, 1836).

Winchester, Samuel Gover, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Rock Run, Hartford Co., Md., Feb. 17, 1805. He received a good academical training; began the study of law, but afterwards studied theology in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J.; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Baltimore in 1829; and was ordained and installed pastor of the Sixth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, Pa., May 4, 1830. In 1837 he resigned his charge and was employed as an agent of the General Assembly's Board of Domestic Missions; in the autumn of the same year he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church in Natchez, Miss., where he continued in the faithful discharge of his duties until his death, Aug. 31, 1841. Mr. Winchester was the author of Companion for the Sick (1833), altered from Willison's Afflicted Man's Companion, with additions:—Christian Counsel to the Sick (1836);—A Discourse at Oakland College (1838);—The Theatre (Phila. 12mo);—Importance of Family Religion, with Prayers and Hymns (1841, 12mo). Winchester, Thomas, D.D., a learned English divine, was born in the County of Berks about the beginning of the 18th century. He was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford; was a tutor there for many years; received a fellowship in 1747; became rector of Appleton, Berkshire, in 1761; held for some years the curacy of Astley Chapel, near Asbury, in Warwickshire; and died May 17, 1780. He published A Dissertation on the XVIIth Article of the Church of England, etc. (1773).

Winckelmann, JOHANN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1551 at Homburg, in Hesse. He studied at different universities; received the degree of doctor of divinity at Basle in 1581, and was appointed court preacher at Cassel in 1582. In 1592 he was called as professor of theology to Marburg; in 1607 he received the chair of theology at Giessen, and in 1612 the superintendency there. He died Aug. 16, 1626. He wrote commentaries on the Minor Prophets, the gospels of SS. Mark and Luke, the epistles to the Romans and Galatians; on St. Peter's and James's epistles, and on the Apocalypse. He also wrote dissertations on different passages of Scripture and on theological and other subjects. Winckler (or Winkler), JOHANN, one of the most faithful, important, and judicious of the friends of Spener (q. v.), was born July 13, 1642, at Götzern, near Grimma, and was educated at Leipsic and Tübingen. He had become acquainted with Spener before he entered upon his first pastorate at Hamburg in 1671, and received ordination at his hands. In 1672 Winckler became superintendent at Braubach; 1676, court preacher at Darmstadt; 1678, pastor at Mannheim; and 1679, superintendent at Wertheim. He had already, at Darmstadt, begun to hold private devotional meetings, such as he had observed to be a useful means of grace in the ministry of Spener at Frankfort. On Aug. 31, 1684, he was, on the recommendation of Spener, chosen chief pastor of St. Michael's at Hamburg, and that city continued afterwards to be his home while he lived. Soon after his settlement in Hamburg (1686), he came into controversy with Dr. Joh. Friedr. Mayer, pastor of St. Jacobi, respecting the theatre, which Mayer defended against Winckler's aspersions; and the dispute was renewed with greater acrimony when Dr. Schultz, the senior of Hamburg, submitted a formula, made binding by an oath, and directed against all fanatics, to the ministers of Hamburg for their signature. Winckler and his friends Horb and Hinckelmann (q. v.) refused to sign the paper, and various theologians in other places, among them Spener, had written against its adoption, while Mayer became its impassioned advocate. Winckler ultimately felt constrained to discuss the matter in dispute in the pulpit, which he did in four sermons delivered April 25 to May 16, 1693. In the course of the dispute Horb was expelled from the city, but Mayer was thoroughly defeated. An amnesty was secured in June, 1694. In 1699 the death of Schultz transferred the office of senior to Winckler, and Mayer chose, in consequence, to remove to Greifswald. Winckler died April 5, 1705.

Winckler had few equals as a preacher, though his sermons are difficult to read by reason of the extraneous matter inserted when they were prepared for the press. Some of them extend over one hundred pages, and are theological treatises rather than sermons. He was eminent as a scholar in exegesis and Biblical theology, and had A. H. Francke for his pupil; he rendered meritorious service to the cause of education in the enlarging of a number of schools and the founding of many others. He was from an early period of his life a supporter of the principles and methods of Spener, writing in their defence Bedenken über Kriegsmann's Symphonie, etc. (Hanau, 1679):—Antwort auf Diefeld's gründl. Erörterung der Frage von den Privatzusammenkünften (ibid. 1681):—and Sendschreiben an Dr. Harnekenium (Hamburg, 1690); but he was not a blind supporter of Spener, and preserved an independent character to the end, as is illustrated especially by his judgment in the case of the fanatical Fräulein v. d. Asseburg, expressed in Schriftmässiges Bedenken (ibid. 1698). Francke prepared for the founding of the Halle Orphanage at Winckler's house in 1688; and in the same year Winckler drew up the plan for a Bible Society, and began its work by the issue of several editions of the Bible at the expense of himself and a number of friends. He caused a new liturgy and hymn-book to be prepared for the Church of Hamburg, and devised a systematic plan for examining candidates. See Geffeken, Joh. Winckler u. d. Hamb. Kirche in seiner Zeit, etc. (ibid. 1684–1705; 1861).—Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

Winder, HENRY, D.D., a learned English Dissenter, was born at Hutton John, in the parish of Graystock, Cumberland, May 15, 1698. He was educated at Penruddock and at Whitehaven; continued his studies privately in Dublin for two years; became pastor of a congregation at Tunley, Lancashire, and was ordained in 1716; was chosen pastor of the meeting at Castle Hey, Liverpool, in 1718, where he continued to labor until his death, Aug. 9, 1752. He is known to the literary world by his "ingenious and elaborate work," A Critical and Chronological History of the Rise, Progress, Declension, and Revival of Knowledge, Chiefly Religious, in Two Periods—the Period of Tradition, from Adam to Moses; and the Period of Letters, from Moses to Christ (1745). A second edition appeared in 1756, with Memoirs of his life, by Rev. George Bronson, D.D.

Window (usually חַלּוֹן, challôn; Chald. כַּו, kar, Dan. vi, 10; Gr. θύρα). The window of an Oriental house consists generally of an aperture (as the word challôn implies) closed in with lattice-work, named in Hebrew by the terms arubbâh (אַרְבָּעַי, Eccles. xii, 3, A. V. "window"; Hos. xiii, 3, A. V. "chimney"), charakkim חַרְקִים, Cant. ii, 9, and eshnâb (אֶשְׁנָב, Judg. v, 28; Prov. vii, 6, A. V. "casement"), the two former signifying the interlaced work of the lattice, and the third the coolness produced by the free current of air through it. Other Heb. terms rendered "window" are צִוְחָר, tsôhar (Gen. vi, 16; a light or opening to admit it, elsewhere "noon"), and שִׁקְיָה, shêqeph (1 Kings vi, 5) or שִׁקְיָה, shakûph (vi, 4; vii, 4), which means timbers or beams. See ARK; TEMPLE.

Glass has been introduced into Egypt in modern times as a protection against the cold of winter; but lattice-work is still the usual, and with the poor the only, contrivance for closing the window (Lane, Modern Egypt, i, 29). When the lattice-work was open, there appears to have been nothing in early times to prevent a person from falling through the aperture (Acts xx, 9). The windows generally look into the inner court of the house, but in every house one or more look into the street, and hence it is possible for a person to observe the approach of another without being himself observed (Judg. v, 28; 2 Sam. vi, 16; Prov. vii, 6; Cant. ii, 9). In Egypt these outer windows generally project over the doorway (Lane, Modern Egypt, i, 27; Carne, Letters, i, 94). When houses abut on the town-wall, it is not unusual for them to have projecting windows surmounting the wall and looking into the country, as represented in Conybeare and Howson's St. Paul, i, 124. Through such a window the spies escaped from Jericho (Josh. ii, 15), and Paul from Damascus (2 Cor. xi, 33). In the Talmud, Tyrian windows are mentioned (Baba Bathra, iii, 6). See Hartmann, Hebräer, iii, 341 sq.; Oldermann, De Specularibus Veterum (Helmst. 1719). See HOUSE.

Wine, both natural and artificial, is frequently mentioned in the Bible, and in modern times, especially in connection with the temperance cause, its character and use have been a subject of no little nor always temperate controversy. We propose here to treat it in the light of Scripture, history, and morals, unbiassed by the disputes into which learned and good men have allowed themselves to fall upon the subject.

I. Bible Terms.—The produce of the wine-press was described in the Hebrew language by a variety of words indicative either of the quality or of the use of the liquid. It may at once be conceded that the Hebrew terms translated "wine" refer occasionally to an unfermented liquor; but inasmuch as there are frequent allusions to intoxication in the Bible, it is clear that fermented liquors were also in common use. It is also obvious that the Bible generally speaks in terms of strong condemnation of the effects of wine; but it is a fair question whether the condemnation is not rather directed against intoxication and excess than against the substance which is the occasion of the excess.

The following are the words more or less so rendered in the A. V., with a few others of cognate signification and application.

1. Yâyin, יַיִן (A. V. invariably "wine," except Judg. xiii, 14, "vine"; Cant. ii, 4, "banqueting"). This word, the most commonly employed in the Old-Test. Scriptures for wine, is also the most comprehensive, including, like the corresponding English word, wines of all sorts, although used also in a more restricted sense to denote red wine.

(1.) It is etymologically derived, according to Gesenius, from יָיַן, an unused root, having the force of fervecere, astuendi; according to Furst, from יָיַן, like the Arabic يَيْن, Aeth. יַיִן, Gr. φόβος, "et sic porro cæteris in linguis, Arm. gini; Lat. vinum; Eng. wine; Sept. οἶνος, ἀσκήος, γλεῦκος." It has been the current opinion that the Indo-European languages borrowed the term from the Hebrews. The reverse, however, is thought by some to be the case (Renan, Lang. Sém., i, 207), and the word has been referred either to the root wē, "to weave," whence come viere, vimen, vitis, vitta (Pott, Etym. Forsch. i, 120, 280), or to the root wan, "to love" (Kuhn, Zeitschr. f. vergl. Sprachf. i, 191, 192). However this may be, the etymological connection and substantial identity of the above Heb., Greek, Latin, and English words cannot be doubted.

(2.) In most of the passages in the Bible where yâyin is used (83 out of 138), it certainly means fermented grape-juice, and in the remainder it may fairly be presumed to do so. In four only (Isa. xvi, 10; Jer. xi, 10–12; Lam. ii, 12) is it really doubtful. In no passage can it be positively shown to have any other meaning. The corresponding English word "wine" properly means "the fermented juice of the grape." It always has this meaning, except when expressly modified by the immediate connection in which it is used. The same is true of its equivalent congeners—Greek, οἶνος; Latin, vinum; German, wein; French, vin, etc.

The intoxicating character of yâyin in general is plain from Scripture. To it are attributed the "darkly flashing eye" (Gen. xlix, 12; A. V. "red," but see Gesenius, Thesaur. Append. p. 89), the unbridled tongue (Prov. xx, 1; Isa. xxviii, 7), the excitement of the spirit (Prov. xxxi, 6; Isa. v, 11; Zech. ix, 16; x, 7), the enchainment of its votaries (Hos. iv, 11), the perverted judgment (Prov. xxxi, 5; Isa. xxviii, 7), the indecent exposure (Hab. ii, 15, 16), and the sickness resulting from the heat (chemâh, A. V. "bottles") of wine (Hos. vii, 5). So in actual instances: Noah planted a vineyard, and drank of the yáyin and was drunken (Gen. ix, 21); Nabal drank yáyin and was very drunken (1 Sam. xxv, 36, 37); the "drunkards of Ephraim" were "overcome with yáyin" (Isa. xxviii, 1), or rather, knocked down, or, as Gill paraphrases it, "smitten, beaten, knocked down with it as with a hammer, and laid prostrate on the ground, where they lie fixed to it, not able to rise." Jeremiah says, "I am like a drunken man, and like a man whom yáyin hath overcome" (xxiii, 9).

The intoxicating quality of yáyin is confirmed by Rabbinical testimony. The Mishna, in the treatise on the Passover, informs us that four cups of wine were poured out and blessed, and drunk by each of the company at the eating of the Paschal lamb, and that water was also mixed with the wine, because it was considered too strong to be drunk alone (Pesachim, vii, 13; x, 1). In Hieros. Shabb. (xi, 1) we read, "It is commanded that this rite be performed with red wine;" Babylon. Shabb. (lxxvii, 1), "Sharon wine is of famous report, with which they mix two parts of water;" Babylon. Berachoth (fol. 1), "Their wine (יין) was very strong, and not fit for drinking without being mixed with water." The Gemara adds, "The cup of blessing is not to be blessed until it is mixed with water;" the Jerusalem Talmud says, "It became a man nobly to entertain his wife and children (at the Passover), that at this feast they might be merry with wine" (יין). To meet the objection How can intoxication be hindered? the rabbins replied, "Because wine between eating does not intoxicate a man" (Hieros. Talm.). See Dr. Tattam's Reply to a Pamphlet by Rev. W. Ritchie on the Scripture Testimony against Intoxicating Wine, p. 8, 9.

But, although usually intoxicating, yet it was not only permitted to be drunk, but was also used for sacred purposes, and is spoken of as a blessing. Thus, in Jacob's blessing on Judah, "His eyes shall be red with yáyin, and his teeth white with milk" (Gen. xlix, 12). So in God's promise to restore his people to their own land, "I will bring again the captivity of my people . . . and they shall plant vineyards and drink the yáyin thereof" (Amos iv, 19). "Drink thy yáyin," says the preacher, "with a merry heart, for God now accepteth thy works" (Eccles. ix, 7). The Nazarite, at the expiration of his vow, was permitted to drink yáyin (Numb. vi, 13-20); the Israelites were permitted to drink yáyin at their feasts (Deut. xiv, 24-26); yáyin was used in the sacred service of Jehovah, being poured out as a drink-offering to him (Exod. xix, 40; Lev. xxiii, 13; Numb. xv, 5). Hence, it not only "maketh glad the heart of man" (Psa. civ, 15), but also "cheereth both God and man" (Judg. ix, 13); its cheering effects being symbolically transferred to the Divine Being.

Some, indeed, have argued from these passages that yáyin could not always have been alcoholic. But this is begging the question, and that in defiance of the facts. Although invariably fermented, it was not always properly inebriating, and in most instances, doubtless, was but slightly alcoholic, like the vin ordinaire of France, or our own cider.

2. Tirôsh, תירוש (Gen. xxvii, 28-38; Numb. xviii, 12; Deut. vii, 13; xi, 14; xii, 17; xiv, 23; xviii, 4; xxviii, 5; xxxiii, 28; Judg. ix, 13; 2 Kings xviii, 32; 2 Chron. xxxi, 5; xxxii, 28; Neh. v, 11; x, 37; Psa. iv, 7; Isa. xxi, 17; lxii, 8; Jer. xxxi, 12; Hos. ii, 8, 9, 22; vii, 14; Joel ii, 19, 24; rendered "new wine" in Neh. x, 39; xiii, 5, 12; Prov. iii, 10; Isa. xxiv, 7; lxxv, 8; Hos. iv, 11; ix, 2; Joel i, 10; Hag. i, 11; Zech.

ix, 17; "sweet wine," in Mic. vi, 15), properly signifies must, the freshly pressed juice of the grape (the γλεύκος, or sweet wine of the Greeks, rendered "new wine" in Acts ii, 13). The word (rendered in the Sept. by three distinct terms, οἶνος, ῥῶξ, μέθυμα) occurs sometimes in connection with yáyin, sometimes with oil, and sometimes with words denoting the edible productions of the earth.

(1.) Etymologically, tirôsh is usually referred to the root yarâsh, יָרַשׁ, "to get possession of," applied to wine on account of its inebriating qualities, whereby it gets possession of the brain. So Gesenius, "Mustum, novum vinum ita dictum quia inebriat, cerebrum occupat" (Thesaur. p. 633); and Flirst, "Mustum uvis expressum, A. V. יָרַשׁ, occupare, acquirere, comparare" (Concord. p. 525, 2). But according to Bythner, as quoted by Lees (Tirôsh, p. 52), it refers to the vine as being a possession (כָּר' יְצֹחֶה) in the eyes of the Hebrews. Neither of these explanations is wholly satisfactory, but the second is less so than the first, inasmuch as it would be difficult to prove that the Hebrews attached such pre-eminent value to the vine as to place it on a par with landed property, which is designated by the cognate terms yerushshâh and morashâh. Nor do we see that any valuable conclusion could be drawn from this latter derivation; for, assuming its correctness, the question would still arise whether it was on account of the natural or the manufactured product that such store was set on the vine.

(2.) As to the exclusively liquid character of the substance denoted, both yáyin and tirôsh are occasionally connected with expressions that would apply properly to a fruit; the former, for instance, with verbs significant of gathering (Jer. xl, 10, 12) and growing (Psa. civ, 14, 15); the latter with gathering (Isa. lxii, 9, A. V. "brought it together"), treading (Mic. vi, 15), and withering (Isa. xxiv, 7; Joel i, 10). So, again, the former is used in Numb. vi, 4, to define the particular kind of tree whose products were forbidden to the Nazarite, viz. the "pendulous shoot of the vine;" and the latter in Judg. ix, 13, to denote the product of the vine. It should be observed, however, that in most, if not all, the passages where these and similar expressions occur there is something to denote that the fruit is regarded not simply as fruit, but as the raw material out of which wine is manufactured. Thus, for instance, in Psa. civ, 15, and Judg. ix, 13, the cheering effects of the product are noticed, and that these are more suitable to the idea of wine than of fruit seems self-evident: in one passage, indeed, the A. V. connects the expression "make cheerful" with bread (Zech. ix, 17); but this is a mere mis-translation, the true sense of the expression there used being to nourish or make to grow. So, again, the treading of the grape in Mic. vi, 15 is in itself conclusive as to the pregnant sense in which the term tirôsh is used, even if it were not subsequently implied that the effect of the treading was, in the ordinary course of things, to produce the yáyin which was to be drunk. In Isa. lxii, 9, the object of the gathering is clearly conveyed by the notice of drinking. In Isa. xxiv, 7, the tirôsh, which withers, is paralleled with yáyin in the two following verses. Lastly, in lxxv, 8, the nature of the tirôsh, which is said to be found in the cluster of the grapes, is not obscurely indicated by the subsequent eulogium, "a blessing is in it." That the terms "vine" and "wine" should be thus interchanged in poetical language calls for no explanation. We can no more infer from such instances that the Hebrew terms mean grapes as fruit than we could infer the same of the Latin vinum because in some two or three passages (Plautus, Trim. ii, 4, 125; Varro, De Ling. Lat. iv, 17; Cato, De Re Rustica, c. 147) the term is transferred to the grape out of which wine is made.

Moreover, tirôsh generally follows "corn" in the triplet "corn, wine, and oil," and hence the term applied to the consumption of corn is carried on, in accordance with the grammatical figure zeugma, to the other members of the clause, as in Deut. xii, 17. In the only passage where the act of consuming tirōsh alone is noticed (Isa. lxii, 8, 9) the verb is shathāh (שָׁתָה), which constantly indicates the act of drinking (e. g. Gen. ix, 21; xxiv, 22; Exod. vii, 21; Ruth ii, 9), and is the general term combined with akāl (אָכַל) in the joint act of "eating and drinking" (e. g. 1 Sam. xxx, 16; Job i, 4; Eccles. ii, 24). We can find no confirmation for the sense of sucking assigned to the term by Dr. Lees (Tirōsh, p. 61): the passage quoted in support of that sense (Psa. lxxv, 8) implies, at all events, a kind of sucking allied to drinking rather than to eating, if indeed the sense of drinking be not the more correct rendering of the term. An argument has been drawn against the usual sense assigned to tirōsh, from the circumstance that it is generally connected with "corn," and therefore implies an edible rather than a drinkable substance. The very opposite conclusion may, however, be drawn from this circumstance; for it may be reasonably urged that in any enumeration of the materials needed for man's support, "meat and drink" would be specified rather than several kinds of the former and none of the latter. "Bread and water" occur together very often (e. g. Ezek. iv, 17; 1 Sam. xxv, 11, etc.). Is water, then, a solid?

There are, finally, passages which seem to imply the actual manufacture of tirōsh by the same process by which wine was ordinarily made. For, not to insist on the probability that the "bringing together," noticed in Isa. lxii, 9 would not appropriately apply to the collecting of the fruit in the wine-vat, we have notice of the "treading" in connection with tirōsh in Mic. vi, 15, and again of the "overflowing" and the "bursting out" of the tirōsh in the vessels or lower vat (יָקַעַב, yēkeb, Sept. ὑπολήμιον), which received the must from the proper press (Prov. iii, 10; Joel ii, 24). This, according to the author of Tirōsh Lo Yāyin, is an "image of abundance;" the "vats piled up with fruits so full that what was put on would roll off to the ground, because they could hold no more!" (p. 54).

(3.) As to the intoxicating character of this drink, the allusions to its effects are confined to a single passage, but this a most decisive one, viz. Hos. iv, 11, "Whoredom and wine (yāyin), and new wine (tirōsh) take away the heart," where tirōsh appears as the climax of engrossing influences, in immediate connection with yāyin.

The inevitable impression produced on the mind by a general review of the above notices is that both yāyin and tirōsh, in their ordinary and popular acceptance, referred to fermented, intoxicating wine. In the condemnatory passages no exception is made in favor of any other kind of liquid passing under the same name, but not invested with the same dangerous qualities. Nor, again, in these passages is there any decisive condemnation of the substance itself, which would enforce the conclusion that elsewhere an unfermented liquid must be understood. The condemnation must be understood of excessive use in any case: for even where this is not expressed, it is implied; and therefore the instances of wine being drunk without any proof of the act may, with as great a probability, imply the moderate use of an intoxicating beverage, as the use of an un-intoxicating one.

The notices of fermentation are not very decisive. A certain amount of fermentation is implied in the distension of the leather bottles when new wine was placed in them, and which was liable to burst old bottles. It has been suggested that the object of placing the wine in bottles was to prevent fermentation, but that in "the case of old bottles fermentation might ensue from their being impregnated with the fermenting substance" (Tirōsh, p. 65). This is not inconsistent with the statement in Matt. ix, 17, but it detracts from the spirit of the comparison which implies the presence of a strong, expansive, penetrating principle. It is, however, inconsistent with Job xxxii, 19, where the distension is described as occurring even in new bottles. It is very likely that new wine was preserved in the state of must by placing it in jars or bottles, and then burying it in the earth. But we should be inclined to understand the passages above quoted as referring to wine drawn off before the fermentation was complete, either for immediate use, or for the purpose of forming it into sweet wine after the manner described by the Geoponic writers (vii, 19). The presence of the gas-bubble, or, as the Hebrews termed it, "the eye" that sparkled in the cup (Prov. xxiii, 31), was one of the tokens of fermentation having taken place, and the same effect was very possibly implied in the name chēmer (חֶמֶר).

The testimony of the rabbins is to the same effect. They say, "Tirōsh, תִּירוֹשׁ, is new wine; the liquor of the grapes first pressed out, which easily takes possession of the mind of man" (Sanhedr. lxxvi, 1). "If thou abuse it, thou shalt be poor; if thou rightly use it, thou shalt be head" (Yoma, lxxvi, 2). Again, in the Gemara, "Wherefore is it called tirōsh? Because all who are drawn to it shall be poor." Such is the testimony of the rabbins, "who ought to know something of their own language." In accordance with this, the Targumists Onkelos and Jonathan render tirōsh, in every instance of its occurrence (except in three cases where there is no word, or the word for vineyard, by the word חֶמֶר, chamar (see Tattam, Reply, p. 5, 6).

3. Chēmer, חֶמֶר (from חֶמַר, astuavit, ferbul), or in its Chaldean form, chamār, חֶמַר (Sept. οἶνος, kalós), is "vinum a fervendo et fermentando dictum" (Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 493). The word occurs eight times—twice (Deut. xxxii, 14; Isa. xxvii, 2) in its Hebrew and six times (Ezra vi, 9; vii, 22; Dan. v, 1, 2, 4, 23) in its Chaldean form. In Deut. xxxii, 14 it is (in the A. V., after the Vulg.) treated as an adjective, and rendered "pure"—"the pure blood of the grape," instead of "the blood of the grape—wine," chēmer. The rabbins call it "pure or neat wine" (i. e. no water being mixed with the juice of the grape), "because it disturbs the head and the brain" (Tattam). They regarded chēmer and tirōsh "as equivalent terms." This pure, powerful wine was permitted to the Israelites (Deut. xxxii, 14); and is spoken of with approbation by Isaiah, "In that day sing ye unto him, A vineyard of red wine (chēmer); I, the Lord, do keep it" (xxvii, 2, 3). Cyrus and Artaxerxes commanded that chēmer should be given to the people of Israel "for the service of the God of heaven" (Ezra vi, 9).

4. Shekār, שֶׁכָּר (from שֶׁכַר, inebriavit se; Sept. οἶκος, οἶνος, μέθυσμα, μέθη; Vulg. vinum), is "temetum, an inebriating drink, whether wine prepared or distilled from barley or from honey or from dates" (Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 1440). So Fürst, who adds, "or any other kind of intoxicating drink comprehended under the name טִין סִיקְרוֹן." Jerome says, "Sicera (שֶׁכָּר) Hebraeo sermone omnis potio, quæ inebriare potest, sive illa quæ frumento conficitur, sive pomorum succo, aut quæ favi decoquantur in dulcem et barbaram potionem, aut palmarum fructus exprimentur in liquore, coctisque frugibus aqua pinguior coloratur (Ep. ad Nepotianum). In the A. V. the word is once rendered "strong wine" (Numb. xxviii, 7); and elsewhere, occurring along with yāyin, "strong drink" (vi, 8; Deut. xxix, 6; Judg. xiii, 4, 7, 14; Isa. v, 11; lvi, 12; Mic. ii, 11; and the passages cited below). Onkelos, On Numb. xxviii, 7, calls it "old wine." Rabbi Solomon, rabbi Eleasar, Aben-Ezra, and others call it "intoxicating wine." "The word means strong drink, from whatever substance made" (Tattam). It was used as a drink-offering in the service of God (Numb. xxviii, 7), and was, notwithstanding its highly intoxicating property, permitted to the Israelites (Deut. xiv, 26). See DRINK, STRONG.

A vain attempt has been made, by connecting the word etymologically with sugar, to prove, in the face of the clearest evidence to the contrary, that it was a sweet, non-intoxicating syrup (see Lees, Works). The word is employed in the following passages in such a manner as to show decisively that it denotes an intoxicating drink: Lev. x, 9, where the priests are forbidden to drink wine or shekâr when they go into the tabernacle; 1 Sam. i, 15, where Hannah, charged with drunkenness by Eli, replies it is not so—"I have drunk neither wine nor shekâr;" Psa. lxxix, 12, where the psalmist complains, "I was the song of the drinkers of shekâr" (A. V. "drunkards"); Prov. xx, 1, "Wine is a mocker, shekâr is raging, and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise;" xxxi, 4, 5, "It is not for kings to drink wine, nor for princes shekâr, lest they drink and forget the law;" Isa. v, 22, "Woe unto them that are mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle shekâr;" xxviii, 7, "They also have erred through wine, and through shekâr are out of the way: the priest and the prophet have erred through shekâr, they are swallowed up of wine, they are out of the way through shekâr;" xxix, 9, "They are drunken, but not with wine; they stagger, but not with shekâr."

5. Asis, אֲסִיס (from אָסַף, to tread; Sept. vāma, γλασσιμός, οἶνος νέος, μέση; Targ. אֲסִיס, אֲסִיס, "pure wine;" Vulg. "dulcedo, mustum"), is must, that which is expressed from grapes by treading, or from pomegranates (Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 1054). Henderson says, "By אֲסִיס is meant the fresh wine, or juice of the grape or other fruit which has just been pressed out, and is remarkable for its sweet flavor and its freedom from intoxicating qualities" (Comment. on Joel i, 5). Its extraction from pomegranates is referred to in Cant. viii, 2 ("juice"). Yet its intoxicating quality seems intimated in Isa. xlix, 26, "They shall be drunken with their own blood as with sweet wine" (asis); Joel i, 5, "Awake, ye drunkards, and weep . . . because of the new wine (asis), for it is cut off from your mouth." It is promised by God as a blessing (Joel iii, 17, 18; Amos ix, 13).

6. Sôbê, סֹבֵי (from סָבַח, potavi, idque intemperantius, gurgulavi, to drink to excess, to tope [Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 932]; Sept. οἶνος; Vulg. vinum), occurs only in three places (Isa. i, 22, "wine;" Hos. iv, 18, "drink;" Nah. i, 10, "drunken"), but the verb and participle often—the latter to denote drunk, a drunkard, a toper. Gesenius renders the noun in Isa. i, 22 vinum, but in Hos. iv, 18 compotatio, a drinking-bout, a carouse; so Henderson, Dathe, etc. The Sept. must have followed a various reading in this place. Sôbê, then, means some (or perhaps any) kind of intoxicating drink.

7. Mêsek, מֵסֵק (from מִצַּק, to mix, or mingle), is wine mixed with water or aromatics (Sept. κίπασμα; Vulg. mistum). It occurs only once (Psa. lxxv, 9); but the participial noun מִצְקִים, mînsâk, is found in Prov. xxiii, 30; Isa. lxxv, 11, in a similar sense=wine-highly spiced, to improve its flavor and enhance its intoxicating power. See below.

8. Shemarim, שְׁמַרִים (from שָׁמַר, to keep, preserve, lay up; Sept. τηγνός, φύλαγμα, δόξα; Vulg. feces, vendemia; A. V. "lees," "dregs," "wine on the lees"), occurs five times, and always in the plural. It is used both of lees and of wine preserved on the lees: of lees, Psa. lxxv, 8; Jer. xlviii, 11; Zeph. i, 12, in all which passages it is used in a figurative sense; in the second and third, the form of expression is proverbial, being used of individuals and nations—"de iis qui desides, atque otiosi sunt, vel certe vita utuntur quieti, tranquilla, metaphora a vino petita, quod diu in cella reconditum fœcibus superjacet et intactum asservatur, quo validius fit vinum odorque fragrantior" (Gesenius, The- saur. p. 1444). It is used of wine, Isa. xxv, 6 (bis), where the prophet foretells the rich provision of Gospel blessings under the figure of "a feast of fat things, of wines on the lees, shemarim, well refined (שְׁמַרִים, defecated—i. e. "vinum vetus et nobilissimum a fœcibus purgatum" (Gesenius), or "cum fœcibus servatum" (Hefenwein), quod defecatum et clarificatum in conviviis opiparis apponitur" (Fürst, Concord. p. 1177). The word is used of lees, according to some, "from their preserving the strength and flavor of wine" (Alexander); according to others as "id quod ad ultimum usque reservatur et remanet—fœces, utpote quæ in imo vasis fundo subsident" (Fürst). This "vetus et nobilissimum vinum" is spoken of approvingly in the last-cited passage.

9. Ashishâh, אֲשִׁישָׁה (Sept. λάγανον ἀπὸ πηγάνου, πέμμα, ἀμπίτης—i. e. a cake from the frying-pan, a baked cake, a sweet cake—is a variation of rendering truly. The Targ. of Jonathan on Exod. xvi, 31 uses אֲשִׁישָׁה for the Heb. פַּתִּיתִי, a flat cake. The traditio Judaica is אֲשִׁישָׁה, a jar of wine. The A. V. has "flagons," "flagons of wine". The plural of the word occurs both in the masculine and feminine forms. Critics are pretty generally agreed that it does not denote wine or any other drink, but a cake, such as was "prepared from dried grapes, or raisins pressed or compacted into a certain form. Cakes of this kind are mentioned as delicacies with which the weary and languid are refreshed (2 Sam. vi, 19; 1 Chron. xvi, 3; Cant. ii, 5), and were offered in sacrifice to idols (Hos. iii, 1). They differed from אֲשִׁישָׁה, i. e. grapes dried but not compacted into the form of cakes; and also from אֲשִׁישָׁה, i. e. figs pressed into cakes." So Gesenius, who derives the word from אֲשַׁח, to press, although Ginsburg would derive it from a similar form denoting to burn. The evidence seems in favor of a cake, especially a grape cake, in which latter sense it certainly occurs in Hos. iii, 1, where, however, it is written more fully, or rather with the addition of אֲשִׁישָׁה, grapes, which fills up its meaning, אֲשִׁישָׁה אֲשִׁישָׁה=cakes of grapes. Dr. Tattam, resting on the authority of rabbins whom he quotes, seems inclined to abide by the rendering of the A. V. (see Reply, p. 13, 14). See CAKE.

10. Three other words may here be noticed. Chômet, חֹמֶט (Sept. ὄξος, but in Prov. x, 26 δμφαξ, i. e. sour grapes; so the Syr.; Vulg. acetum; A. V. "vinegar," rightly), occurs five times. This, it appears, was obtained either from yâyin or shekâr (Numb. vi, 3), and was used by those engaged in the labors of the field to soften and render more palatable the dry bread which formed the food of the reapers (Ruth ii, 14). It was also used as a beverage, probably mixed with water (Numb. vi, 3), in which case it would resemble the posca of the Romans, which was not an intoxicating drink, and was used only by the poorer classes (Plaut. Mil. Glor. iii, 2, 23). In Matt. xxvii, 34 our Lord is said to have had vinegar mingled with gall offered to him to drink when on the cross. Mark (xv, 23) says it was wine mingled with myrrh; Luke that it was vinegar offered by the soldiers in mockery (xxiii, 36); and John that it was vinegar (xix, 29). Possibly these accounts refer to two separate occurrences—the one an act of cruelty on the part of the soldiers, who, in response to our Lord's exclamation, "I thirst," offered him some of their own posca; the other an act of intended kindness, designed to alleviate his sufferings by an anodyne. See VINEGAR.

Anabim, אֲנָבִים (A. V. "wine" in Hos. iii, 1; elsewhere correctly "grapes"). See GRAPE.

Yêkeb, יֵקֵב (A. V. "wine" in Deut. xvi, 13; elsewhere correctly "press"). See WINE-PRESS.

11. In the New Test. several words are employed denoting wine.

(1.) Οἶνος, comprehending every sort of wine.

(2.) Γλεύκος, sweet, or "new wine," which, as well as the former, seems, from the use made of it (Acts ii, 13), to signify wine of an intoxicating quality. "These men are full of new wine," to which charge Peter replies, "These men are not drunken as ye suppose" (v. 15), although Dr. Lees's interpretation is fairly admissible that the language is that of mockery, as if we should say of a drunken man, He has taken too much water. The gleukos was the fruit of the grape, so kept as to preserve its sweetness, "perhaps made of a remarkably sweet, small grape, which is understood by the Jewish expositors to be meant by sorék (שֹׂרֵק, Gen. xlix, 11), or sorékâh (שֹׂרֵקָה, Isa. v, 2), and still found in Syria and Arabia" (Alford, On Acts ii, 13). So Suidas, τὸ ἀποσταλάγμα τῆς σταφυλῆς πρὶν παρῆσθαι. It could not be new wine, in the proper sense of the term, inasmuch as about eight months must have elapsed between the vintage and the feast of Pentecost. It might have been applied, just as mustum was by the Romans, to wine that had been preserved for about a year in an unfermented state (Cato, De Re Rustica, c. 120). But the explanations of the ancient lexicographers rather lead us to infer that its luscious qualities were due, not to its being recently made, but to its being produced from the very purest juice of the grape; for both in Hesychius and the Etymologicum Magnum the term γλεύκος is explained to be the juice that flowed spontaneously from the grape before the treading commenced. The name itself, therefore, is not conclusive as to its being an unfermented liquor, while the context implies the reverse—for Peter would hardly have offered a serious defence to an accusation that was not seriously made; and yet if the sweet wine in question were not intoxicating, the accusation could only have been ironical (see Walch, De Natura τοῦ γλεύκους [Jen. 1755]).

As considerable stress is laid upon the quality of sweetness as distinguished from strength, we may observe that the usual term for the inspissated juice of the grape, which was characterized more especially by sweetness, was debâsh (דְּבַשׁ), rendered in the A. V. "honey" (Gen. xliii, 11; Ezek. xxvii, 17). This was prepared by boiling it down either to a third of its original bulk, in which case it was termed sapa by the Latins and ἔψημα or σίρσιον by the Greeks, or else to half its bulk, in which case it was termed defrutum (Pliny, xiv, 11). Both the substance and the name, under the form of dibs, are in common use in Syria at the present day.

We may further notice a less artificial mode of producing a sweet liquor from the grape, namely, by pressing the juice directly into the cup, as described in Gen. xl, 11.

Lastly, there appears to have been a beverage, also of a sweet character, produced by macerating grapes, and hence termed the "liquor" (לִיקוֹר) of grapes (Numb. vi, 3). These later preparations are allowed in the Koran (xvi, 69) as substitutes for wine.

(3.) Γέννημα, or γίνημα, τῆς ἀμπέλου, fruit of the vine = wine (Luke xxii, 18).

(4.) Οἶνος ἀκρατος, pure wine (Rev. xiv, 10)—οἶνον ἀκρατον εἶναι λέγομεν, ὃ μὴ μέμικται τὸ ὕδωρ, ἢ παντάσῃσιν ὀλίγον μέμικται (Galen in Wettstein, cited by Alford). Here the phrase is used figuratively. See below.

(5.) Ὀζος, sour wine, or vinegar (Matt. xxvii, 48; Mark xv, 36, etc.).

(6.) Σικερα (A. V. "strong drink;" Heb. שִׁכְרָה), "any strong drink made of grapes" (Robinson, Alford, etc.).

II. Historical Notices of the Use of Wine in the Bible.—The first instance we have of wine in the Old Test. is in the case of Noah, who "planted a vineyard, and did drink of the wine (yáyin), and was drunken" (Gen. ix, 20, 21). The culture of the vine no doubt existed before, but the patriarch now resumes the occupation which had been interrupted by the Flood. "Nowhere does the vine grow spontaneously in such abundance and excellence as in the region of Ararat, in Armenia, and the Eastern Pontus; but, no doubt, the culture of the vine was of remote antiquity, invented by one nation and spread to other countries; for thus only can the remarkable circumstance be accounted for that wine bears the same name in almost all Eastern and Western nations" (Kalisch, On Gen. ix, 20, 21). "It may be added that the Egyptians attributed the manufacture of wine to Osiris, the Phœnicians and Greeks to Bacchus, the Romans to Saturn" (ibid.). See VINE.

The second notice of wine is in the history of Lot, whose daughters "made their father drink wine" (yáyin), so that he became stupidly intoxicated (Gen. xix, 32, etc.). It next occurs in Isaac's blessing pronounced on Jacob: "The Lord give thee . . . plenty of corn and wine" (yáyin) (Gen. xxvii, 28). The next notice of the juice of the grape (although, be it observed, the product is not called wine) is in connection with Egypt (Gen. xl, 11), when the chief butler says, "I took the grapes and pressed them into Pharaoh's cup." Are we to take these words according to their strict literality? Did the kings of Egypt, at the time, drink the unfermented juice of the grape only? However that may be, and although an affirmative answer seems demanded, yet we know that the vine was cultivated in Egypt from very ancient times, representations of the process of the manufacture of wines being found on tombs belonging to the 4th dynasty; that wine was used almost universally by the rich; that it was freely drunk at the banquets of both men and women, and even excessively, as the monuments abundantly testify; that it was drunk even by the priests, and offered in the temples to their gods. All this is now well ascertained, notwithstanding the contradictory statements of Herodotus on some points (see Rawlinson, Herod. ii, 103, 126; Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i, 144, etc.). It has been inferred from a passage in Plutarch (De Isid. 6) that no wine was drunk in Egypt before the reign of Psammetichus, and this passage has been quoted in illustration of Gen. xl, 11. The meaning of the author seems rather to be that the kings subsequently to Psammetichus did not restrict themselves to the quantity of wine prescribed to them by reason of their sacerdotal office (Diod. i, 70).

In the laws of Moses wine is frequently mentioned as forming the usual drink-offering that accompanied the daily sacrifice (Exod. xxix, 40), the presentation of the first-fruits (Lev. xxiii, 13), and other offerings (Numb. xv, 5). It appears from Numb. xxviii, 7 that strong drink might be substituted for it on these occasions. Tithe was to be paid of wine (tirósh) as of other products, and this was to be consumed "before the Lord," meaning within the precincts of the Temple, or perhaps, as may be inferred from Lev. vii, 16, at the place where the Temple was situated (Deut. xii, 17, 18). The priest was also to receive first-fruits of wine (tirósh), as of other articles (xviii, 4; comp. Exod. xxii, 29); and a promise of plenty was attached to the faithful payment of these dues (Prov. iii, 9, 10). Wine offered to God as a drink-offering (Numb. xv, 5, 7, 10) furnishes the key to the peculiar language of Jotham's parable, "wine that cheereth God and man" (Judg. ix, 13)—an exposition much preferable to that which renders the words "the gods and men;" for wine was offered to God as the drink of the Great King, the symbol of our best spiritual things which we offer in his worship. Wine was forbidden to the priests during the performance of their sacred duties in the tabernacle (Lev. x, 9), which prohibition seems to have originated in the offence of Nadab and Abihu, who, most probably, "transgressed through wine." At other times the priests were at liberty to drink wine. To the Nazirites, while under their vow, not only wine, but vinegar, and the fruit of the vine generally, in every form, was prohibited (Numb. vi, 3, 4). The Israelites were at liberty to drink wine even at their national sacred festivals when rejoicing before the Lord (Deut. xiv, 22-26). The Rechabites are mentioned as very peculiar in their abstinence from wine, as well as their refraining to live in houses, and are commended, not for their abstinence, but for their obedience to the command of their ancestor (Jer. xxxv). The cultivation of the vine was incompatible with the conditions of a nomad life, and it was probably on this account that Jonadab, wishing to perpetuate that kind of life among his posterity, prohibited the use of wine to them. The case is exactly parallel to that of the Nabathæans, who abstained from wine on purely political grounds (Diod. xix, 94).

The use of wine at the paschal feast was not enjoined by the law, but had become an established custom, at all events in the post-Babylonian period. The cup was handed round four times according to the ritual prescribed in the Mishna (Pesach, x, 1), the third cup being designated the "cup of blessing" (1 Cor. x, 16), because grace was then said (Pesach, x, 7). The contents of the cup are specifically described by our Lord as "the fruit" (γέννημα) of the vine (Matt. xxvi, 29; Mark xiv, 25; Luke xxii, 18), and in the Mishna simply as wine. The wine was mixed with warm water on these occasions, as implied in the notice of the warming-kettle (Pesach, vii, 13). Hence in the early Christian Church it was usual to mix the sacramental wine with water, a custom as old, at all events, as Justin Martyr's time (Apol. i, 65). See PASSOVER. The rabbins have a curious tradition, that at the great feast which shall inaugurate the coming of the Messiah he shall drink wine made from grapes which grew in Paradise during the six creative days, and preserved in Adam's cave for that great occasion (Othonis Lex, s. v. "Vinum;" Buxtorf, Syn. Jud. p. 460).

The Pastoral Epistles contain directions as to the moderate use of wine on the part of all holding office in the Church; as that they should not be πάροικοι (1 Tim. iii, 3; A. V. "given to wine"), meaning insolent and violent under the influence of wine; "not given to much wine" (iii, 8); "not enslaved to much wine" (Tit. ii, 3). The term νηφάλεις in 1 Tim. iii, 2 (A. V. "sober"), expresses general vigilance and circumspection (Schleusner, Lex, s. v.; Alford, ad loc.). Paul advises Timothy himself to be no longer an habitual water-drinker, but to take a little wine for his health's sake (1 Tim. v, 23). No very satisfactory reason can be assigned for the place which this injunction holds in the epistle, unless it were intended to correct any possible misapprehension as to the preceding words, "Keep thyself pure." The precepts above quoted, as well as others to the same effect addressed to the disciples generally (Rom. xiii, 13; Gal. v, 21; 1 Pet. iv, 3), show the extent to which intemperance prevailed in ancient times, and the extreme danger to which the Church was subjected from this quarter.

It appears to have been an ancient custom to give medicated or drugged wine to criminals condemned to death, to blunt their senses, and so lessen the pains of execution. To this custom there is supposed to be an allusion, Prov. xxxi, 6, "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish;" and an illustration of the custom is furnished by the soldiers giving Jesus "wine mingled with myrrh," or, which is the same, "vinegar" i. e. sour wine; "mingled with gall," i. e. a bitter drug, without specifying the kind (Mark xv, 23; Matt. xxvii, 34). "Omnes a syndrio ad mortem dammati potarunt" וין חמוץ, vinu chmo (h. e. optimo, forti) ut diriperetur intellectus ejus, ad confirmandum id dicitur, Prov. xxxi, 6, etc. De perituro dicitur, id fieri, ut obliviscatur mortis, quæ est infortunium ipsius" (Schöttgen, Hor. Heb. p. 236). To the same custom some suppose there is a reference in Amos ii, 8, where the "wine of the condemned" (A. V.) is spoken of. The margin reads, instead of condemned, "fined or mulcted;" so Gesenius; Henderson, amerced. The wicked here described, in addition to other evil practices, imposed unjust fines upon the innocent, and spent the money thus unjustly obtained upon wine, which they quaffed in the house of their gods; as Dathe renders: "pecunias hominibus innocentibus extortas compotationibus absumunt in templis deorum suorum."

Mixed wine is often spoken of in Scripture. This was of different kinds. Sometimes it was mixed with water to take it down (Isa. i, 22); sometimes with milk (Cant. v, 1); and sometimes, by lovers of strong drink, with spices of various kinds, to give it a richer flavor and greater potency (Isa. v, 22; Psa. lxxv, 8). Both the Greeks and Romans were in the habit of flavoring their wines with spices, and such preparations were described by the former as wine ἐξ ἀρωμάτων κατασκευάζομενος (Athen. i, 31 e), and by the latter as aromatiles (Pliny, xiv, 19, 5). The authority of the Mishna may be cited in favor both of water and of spices, the former being noticed in Berach, vii, 5; Pesach, vii, 13; and the latter in Shen, ii, 1.

The "royal wine," literally wine of the kingdom, וין מלכות (Esth. i, 7), denotes most probably the best wine, such as the king of Persia himself was accustomed to drink. "Wine of Lebanon" is referred to in such a way as to indicate its peculiar excellence—"the scent thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon" (Hos. xiv, 7). Hence it is thought to have been distinguished by its grateful smell. But וין יקר means, as the margin renders it, memorial, and includes odor, flavor, and refreshing influence. Modern travellers attest the excellence of the wine of Lebanon. The "wine of Helbon, or Chalybon," is mentioned as one of the importations of Tyre (Ezek. xxvii, 18), and was very famous. It was greatly valued by the Persian monarchs (Strabo, xv, 735), as it still is by the residents of Damascus (Porter, Damascus, i, 333).

The wines of modern Palestine are represented by travellers as being of excellent quality. The sweet wines are particularly esteemed in the East, because they are grateful to the taste, very exhilarating, and some of them will keep for a long time. They were therefore preferred by those who were addicted to drinking, and commonly selected for the tables of kings. Their inebriating quality is alluded to by the prophet Isaiah: "I will feed them that oppress you with their own flesh, and they shall be drunken as with sweet wine" (Isa. xlix, 26). "The testimony of travellers respecting the spirituous nature of the wines of Palestine accords with that of the sacred writers. . . . It is observed by Thevenot that the people of the Levant never mingle water with their wine at meals, but drink by itself what water they think proper for abating its strength. While the Greeks and Romans by mixed wine understood wine united and lowered with water, the Hebrews, on the contrary, meant by it wine made stronger and more inebriating by the addition of powerful ingredients. . . . The wines of Palestine are generally kept in bottles made of leather, or goat-skins, sewed or pitched together. In these the process of fermentation took place, and the wine acquired its proper degree of strength. In absence of anything like chemical analysis, these are the data from which we must draw our conclusions concerning the nature of the wines referred to by the sacred writers. Some of them are represented to have been sweet wines, which, if not the strongest, are known to have been very strong. The grapes from which they were produced were remarkable for their richness and excellence; the climate of the country being such as to favor the growth and development of those principles which, during fermentation, were converted into alcohol. As the grapes of that country are now known to furnish very rich and spirituous wines, we may infer that the ancient were similar in their character; since there is abundant evidence that the climate has not suffered any material change for three thousand years. We should not omit, in confirmation of this view of the spirituous nature of the wines of Palestine, to advert to the modes in which they were kept. It is now well known that when mixtures of alcohol and water are put into bladders, the water evaporates and leaves the alcohol in a more concentrated form. It is asserted that wine which has been kept in bottles closed by pieces of bladder firmly tied over the mouth, in a few weeks acquire the strength and flavor which would be imparted to it only by several years' preservation in the ordinary way. Now, it is probable that the leather bags into which these wines are put would produce a similar effect upon the liquor, which, after the process of fermentation had ceased, would soon attain its complete and appropriate alcoholic character" (Prof. Silliman, Amer. Jour. of Science and Arts, 1834).

"The wine was generally contained in large ox-skins ranged round the store-room, and quite distended with liquor. The larger skins seem to have answered to casks; the smaller goat and kid skins, to barrels and kegs in the comparison, to be chiefly used in conveying to customers the smallest quantities required. Individuals rarely keep large stores of wine in their houses, but get a small supply of a goat-skin or two from the wine-store. This seems also to have been the case with the ancient Jews, for Nehemiah, although holding the rank of governor, had no store of wine, for we read he had a supply every ten days (Neh. v, 18). The large skins in the wine-store we have mentioned are supported above the floor on frames of wood" (Kitto, Pict. Bible, note on Job xxxii, 19). Similar methods of storing and keeping wine were common to the Greeks and Romans. See Smith, Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. "Vinum."

III. Teaching of the Scriptures in respect to the Use of Wine.—1. As appears from the foregoing examination, the Bible makes no distinction between intoxicating and non-intoxicating wines—never refers or alludes to such a distinction. Yet wine, יַיִן=olivos, is constantly spoken of in precisely the same way that corn and oil and milk are spoken of—namely, as a blessing sent by God for the use of man. It was enjoined to be used in the service of God. It is employed as a symbol of the highest spiritual blessings (Isa. lv, 1, 2). The use of it was common among the Jews, as it is among the people of all wine-producing countries. It was forbidden to the Nazarites alone, and that only while under their vow. The use of it is in one case distinctly prescribed by Paul to Timothy (1 Tim. v, 23). Jesus Christ came "drinking wine" as well as "eating bread" (Luke vii, 33, 34), and in one instance miraculously produced a supply of wine when it was needed (John ii). We attach great importance, religiously and theologically, to these facts. Jesus was no ascetic. He gave no countenance to asceticism. By drinking wine—freely using the blessings of God's providence—he testified against the error, afterwards called Gnostic and Manichæan, which would attach impurity to that which enters the mouth, and vindicated the liberty of his followers to use "every creature of God" as good and fit for food, and to be received with thanksgiving by them as those who "believe and know the truth" (1 Tim. iv, 3, 4). But this error repelled, and this liberty asserted, none are obliged to drink wine or to eat meat if they prefer not. There is liberty on this side also. They may abstain if they choose. Paul expressed his readiness to abstain from "flesh" and "wine" to secure the good of a brother, or to avoid occasioning him injury (Rom. xiv, 21; comp. 1 Cor. viii, 13). The same liberty is ours; and if a great practical good may be attained by abstinence, Christian benevolence calls us in this direction.

But while liberty to use wine, as well as every other earthly blessing, is conceded and maintained in the Bible, yet all abuse of it is solemnly and earnestly condemned. In the book of Proverbs the warnings against such abuse are frequent and severe (xx, 1; xxiii, 29-35; xxxi, 4-7). It is the same in the New Test. (1 Cor. vi, 10; Gal. v, 21). "Be not drunk with wine—not given to much wine." Such are its precepts—precepts which would have little or no force, or even meaning, were wine not intoxicating, and were there not some peculiar danger incident to its use. If wine were not intoxicating, the apostle might as well have exhorted them against drinking too much milk or too much water. He takes for granted the right to use; he recognises the danger incident to the use; but instead of prohibiting, he cautions and exhorts against excess. Moderation in eating and drinking is the broad Christian law. Abstinence from some kinds of food may become a duty under peculiar circumstances. Self-denial, in relation to things lawful, is often imperative. Wine is good; is a gift of God. It may be used with advantage; it may be abused, but not innocently or with impunity. It may be declined in the exercise of Christian liberty; it ought to be declined if doing so helps forward the cause of humanity, morality, and religion, and promotes the glory of God. In view, however, of the almost impossibility of procuring genuine wine in the United States without extravagant cost, and the fact that in order to its preservation it is invariably more alcoholic than the light wines of Bible times usually were, and especially in view of the dangerous tendency to intoxicating habits involved in the use of wine as a beverage, not only to the drinker, but to his family and friends, it cannot be doubted that the wisest and most Christian course is to abstain wholly from it. This is in accordance with the apostolic precept of self-restraint (1 Cor. viii, 13).

2. There is no positive proof that the fluid used by our Lord in instituting the sacred communion was alcoholic; it is nowhere expressly called wine, but simply the "fruit of the vine" (Matt. xxvi, 29). That it was wine, properly so called, however, is a fair presumption from the fact that this was the customary liquor of the Jews in the Passover meal, as we learn from the definite prescription of the Talmud ("There shall not be less than four cups of wine" [yayin], Mishna, Peasach, x, 1). Many modern Jews, it is said, use the liquor of steeped raisins for paschal purposes; but there is no trace of such a custom in ancient times.

Therefore the use of any other fluid in the communion at the present day must be justified, if at all, from prudential considerations growing out of the modern temperance reform; just as we consider ourselves at liberty to vary the kind of bread (originally unleavened), the posture of the communicant, and other unessential details, to suit the convenience of the occasion and the parties. These considerations are undoubtedly of the gravest character, especially the danger of relapse to reformed inebriates partaking or even approaching the communion-table, where the taste or fumes of alcohol are liable to revive their appetite. If, as it is confidently claimed by many, unfermented grape-juice can be procured at a moderate cost and without great inconvenience, and can be preserved with ordinary care a sufficient length of time, and is not offensive to the sense, or otherwise particularly objectionable, there is no reason why ceremonious scruples should be allowed to stand in the way of its employment. Whether individuals not susceptible to such a danger as the above are excusable in withholding themselves from the communion where alcoholic wine is used, is quite another question, which it does not lie within the scope of this article to discuss.

IV. Literature.—This is quite copious. We mention, in addition to the works noticed above, only the most important and modern. General treatises on the manufacture, etc., of wines have been written by Henderson (Lond. 1831), Redding (ibid. 1851), Denman (ibid. 1864), Thudichum (ibid. 1872), and others, but they are chiefly of a commercial character. The moral aspects of the subject have been considered in numberless books and periodical articles; among the latter we may especially refer to those in the Biblical Repository, Oct. 1836, and

Oct. 1839; and the Bibliotheca Sacra, Jan. 1869; Jan., April, and June, 1880. Dr. F. R. Lees in various works, has strongly asserted that the wines of antiquity were largely non-alcoholic, and this view has incautiously been adopted by several later writers, as Ritchie, Nott, Stuart, Burns, etc., and by many temperance advocates; but it has been powerfully combated by others, especially Tattam, Crosby, and scholars generally. The latest and most complete treatise on this question is that of Wilson, The Wines of the Bible (Lond. 1877), which, after minutely examining all the classical and scriptural references, arrives at the conclusion that "so far as the wines of the ancients are concerned, unfermented wine is a myth." The effort of Samson, The Divine Law as to Wine (N. Y. 1880), to meet this testimony by garbling the ancient statements and contradicting the modern is feeble and unworthy. Tristram observes, "All the terms for wine [in the Bible] are used in collocations which clearly show that fermentation is implied; nor is there the slightest ground in criticism for the pretence that the unfermented juice of the grape was ordinarily used" (Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 411). An article by Rev. H. Bumstead, in the Bibliotheca Sacra for January, 1881, fairly meets the scientific, philological, and moral aspects of the "wine question" as presented by Rev. A. B. Rich, D.D., in the January, April, and July numbers of the same journal. It shows, at least, that alcohol when taken in moderate quantity and in its natural combinations, is not properly a poison, but is assimilated and healthily disposed of in digestion; that tirōsh denotes the produce of the vine in general, while yāyin always signifies the fermented juice of the grape; and that to no one of the words translated "wife" does the Bible attach an indiscriminate and absolute condemnation. See TEMPERANCE.

Winebrenner, Christian, a German Reformed minister, was born Feb. 7, 1789. He entered the ministry in 1838 or 1839, taking charge of several congregations in Bedford and Huntingdon counties, Pa., where he labored until 1846. After this time he was not connected with the Synod, but still continued to preach until the time of his death, at Woodbury, Pa., Feb. 12, 1858. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 491.

Winebrenner, John, an American clergyman, was born in Frederick County, Md., March 25, 1797. He began his ministry in the German Reformed Church, having charge of four congregations in and near Harrisburg, Pa., but, owing to a difference of opinion in regard to revivals, he withdrew from his former affiliations, and established a new denomination which he called "The Church of God," but which is commonly known as the Winebrennarians. See CHURCH OF GOD. Mr. Winebrenner was for several years editor of The Church Advocate. His death occurred Sept. 12, 1860. He published, in connection with I. B. Rupp, The History of all the Religious Denominations in the United States (1844). He also published, Brief View of the Church of God:—a work on Regeneration:—The Reference and Pronouncing Testament:—Revival Hymn-book:—Practical and Doctrinal Sermons:—and other works.

Winer, GEORGE BENEDICT, a German theologian and author, whose work is of permanent value to the Church no less for what it accomplished directly than for the indirect results obtained through its influence over the improvement of Biblical science. He was born at Leipsic, April 13, 1789, of parents in the common walks of life, was early orphaned, and, by the decease of an aunt who was the last of his relatives to assume the charge of his childhood years, exposed to such penury as deprived him of sufficient and proper food, and obliged him to do without books necessary to his course in the St. Nicolai School of his native town. He obtained a Greek grammar by writing it out, and thus began the philological labors in which he was in time to become a master and win an imperishable reputation. He distinguished himself in the scientific contests of the students, and acquired such proficiency in the Hebrew language as enabled him to become the instructor of persons older than himself. His teachers embodied words prophetic of his coming importance as a scholar in his certificate of graduation.

In 1817 Winer began the academical career which extended over forty years of industrious and useful labor. Nine of these years—1823-32—were given to the University of Erlangen, where he was professor of theology, and all the remaining years to Leipsic. He lectured on theological methodology, and, besides, on subjects drawn from every section of exegetical, systematic, and even practical theology. In historical theology he confined his lectures to the history of theological sciences. The general world knows him only through his writings, and acknowledges his influence as a comprehensively and profoundly learned man and a thoroughly scientific character; but the students who thronged his lecture-room to the very end of his public life bear testimony to the power of his clear oral statements and to his decided sympathy for all that is pure and good, as also to his serious and pronounced religious character. He was accustomed to precede or follow his lectures with addresses in which he surveyed, often with truly prophetic vision, the movement of events in the world or the Church; and on those occasions he often rose to the regions of true impassioned eloquence, and wrought impressions which his hearers were not likely to forget. It remains to be added that his tendency was thoroughly orthodox, and that all his impulses grew out of his perfect devotion to moral goodness. He was, however, too earnest a lover of truth to engage in the building of original systems which can only be founded in air, since their authors will not recognize the soundness of any truth that is old and approved, and also too devoted to the service of truth to endorse and repeat the old simply because it is old.

Of the written products of his life a small number belong to the department of symbolics—namely, the Comparative Darstellung des Lehrbegriffs der verschiedenen christlichen Kirchenparteien (1824, 2 ed. 1837), a thoroughly scientific work:—his edition of the Augsburg Confession, with notes (1825):—and two addresses on the idea of the Church as contained in the creeds (1852-53). In bibliography his Handbuch der theologischen Literatur (1821, 3d ed. 1838-40, 2 vols.; and supplement, 1842) is a monument of genuine German industry, and is valuable for its brief biographies of authors. The central object, however, about which all of Winer's literary activity turned was the Bible. Not only had most of his works reference to the Bible, but his most original, meritorious, and permanently useful work for theology was done in the field of Biblical science. He barely touched upon Biblical theology indeed, and gave but passing attention to either the lower or the higher criticism; but in isagogical science he contributed valuable papers to the elucidation of questions respecting versions of the Old Test., e. g. the character of the Samaritan Pentateuch, the value of the Chaldean paraphrases, especially of Onkelos and Pseudo-Jonathan. The interpretation of Scripture engaged his attention more than any other study. He expounded all the books of the New Test. before his classes. But of the results of his labors he gave the world no considerable quantity—a single book, the Epistle to the Galatians (1821, 3 ed. 1829), and sections from other epistles constituting the whole. As the fruit of a whole life given to the study of exegesis this is exceedingly little. But in the discussion of matters of fact from Scripture history he was, on the other hand, very busy with his pen. He wrote dissertations on the taking of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar (1848); on the question whether the δαιμον of Jesus and his disciples (John xiii) were a Passover supper or not (1847); on whether the feet of crucified persons were nailed to the cross or not (1845), etc. His Biblisches

Realwörterbuch, finally, is a comprehensive and thorough dictionary, in alphabetical order, of material objects, events, etc., belonging to Biblical science—a positive mine of historical, geographical, archæological, and physical information.

Of still greater value for theological science were his contributions to the study of the languages of the Bible—whether lexical or grammatical. He cultivated the Old-Test. Chaldee with special fondness. In 1824 he published Grammatik des biblischen und targumischen Chaldäismus (2d ed. 1842), and in 1825 a Chaldee Reader. In 1826 he issued a Specimen Lexici Hebraici, and in 1828 a complete Lexicon of the Hebrew and Chaldee Languages, based on a revision of the Handwörterbuch by Simon and Eichhorn. The most important of all his works is, however, unquestionably the Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Sprachidioms, etc. (1822, and often). It was rendered into English by American scholars in 1825, and has since appeared in repeated editions, which conform to the changes introduced in the original from time to time; and it was translated into Swedish in 1827. The merit of this work consists in its demonstrating that the structure of the Greek language is preserved in the forms and idioms of the New-Test. language, and that vague assumptions of the Hebraizing character of New-Test. Greek, and unrestrained wilfulness in its interpretation, are out of place. The work had its inception in a spirit of reverence for the Bible and in earnest love of truth, and it has achieved gratifying results in the more systematic methods of interpretation, the profounder and yet more elevated modes of exposition, which it helped to introduce. A year after the appearance of the Grammatik, Winer published a Beitrag zur Verbesserung der neutestamentlichen Lexikographie, and he had made extended preparations for a New-Test. lexicon; but he was not permitted to enter on the writing of this work. His sight failed during the last five years of his life. His last course of lectures, on the doctrinal and ethical principles of Protestantism and Roman Catholicism, was delivered in the winter term, 1857–58; and after a violent illness of six days' duration, he died, May 12, 1858, and was buried two days afterwards, amid the lamentations of the university and the entire town.—Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Wines, ENOCH COBB, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Hanover, N. J., Feb. 17, 1806. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1827, after which he entered the navy as chaplain and teacher of midshipmen in the United States ship "Constellation," visiting many foreign countries, and writing an interesting work entitled Two Years and a Half in the Navy; or, A Journal of a Cruise in the Mediterranean and Levant (Phila. 1829–31). He afterwards became pastor of the Church at Burlington, N. J., and also of East Hampton, L. I., which he resigned to become principal of the Edgehill Seminary, Princeton, N. J. He was subsequently professor of mental and moral philosophy in the Central High-school of Philadelphia, and in 1854 professor of ancient languages in Washington College, Pa., and in 1859 in the University of St. Louis. In 1862 he entered upon the work which made him eminent as a philanthropist and specialist in prison reform. He became secretary of the New York Prison Reform Association, and afterwards of the National Association. He was instrumental in the appointment of congresses for prison reform in Europe (visiting that country repeatedly from 1871 to 1875) and America, which accomplished much good in rousing the attention of the civilized world to this benevolent object. He died at Cambridge, Mass., Dec. 10, 1879. Dr. Wines made important contributions to religious literature, and the last work on which he was engaged was in seeing through the Riverside Press at Cambridge, Mass., his book entitled The State of Prisons and of Child-saving Institutions throughout the World. He had prepared another book which was ready for the press, under the title of Complete in Christ. His works, in addition to those mentioned, are, A Trip to Boston (Bost. 1838, 12mo):—Three Hints on a System of Popular Education (Phila. eod. 12mo):—How Shall I Govern my School? (eod. 12mo), addressed to young teachers:—Letters to School Children (Bost. 16mo):—Commentaries on the Laws of the Ancient Hebrews, with an Introductory Essay on Civil Society and Government (N. Y. 1852, 8vo). This work passed through five editions:—Adam and Christ; or, The Doctrine of Representation Stated and Explained (1855, 18mo):—Prelacy and Parity Discussed (N. Y. 12mo):—The True Penitent Portrayed, etc. (Phila.):—Treatise on Regeneration (N. Y. 1863, 12mo):—The Promises of God (Phila. 1868, 18mo):—Essay on Temptation (1865, 12mo). He has also published a number of Addresses, and contributed to the Amer. Quar. Rev., North Amer. Quar. Rev., Biblical Repository, Bibliotheca Sacra, Knickerbocker, etc. See N. Y. Observer, Dec. 18, 1879; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (W. P. S.).

Wing (prop. פֶּנֶךְ, πτερόν). By this word the Hebrews understood not only the wings of birds, but also the lapet, skirt, or flap of a garment (Ruth iii, 9; Jer. ii, 34), the extremity of a country (Job xxxviii, 18; Isa. xxiv, 16); figuratively, the wings of the wind (Psa. xviii, 10), sunbeam (Mal. iv, 2); and, metaphorically, protection or defence (Matt. xxiii, 37). God says that he has borne his people on the wings of eagles (Exod. xxi, 4; see also Deut. xxxii, 11); that is, he had brought them out of Egypt as an eagle carries its young ones upon its wings. The prophet begs of God to protect them under his wings (Psa. xvii, 8), and says that the children of men put their trust in the protection of his wings (xxxvi, 7). Isaiah, speaking of the army of the kings of Israel and Syria who were coming against Judah, says, "The stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Immanuel" (viii, 8).

Wing, M. T. C., D.D., a professor of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Vermont in 1798, and died at Gambier, O., Feb. 26, 1863. Dr. Wing was a graduate of Middlebury College, and after studying at the Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Va., became a tutor in Kenyon College, O. At the time of his death he was professor of ecclesiastical history in the Theological Seminary at Gambier. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. April, 1863, p. 152.

Winifred, the apostle of Germany. See BONIFACE.

Winkelman, FREDERICK T., D.D., an American clergyman and teacher, was professor of Latin, French, and German in the Packer Collegiate Institute, Brooklyn, N. Y., and in a polytechnic school in New York city. He died in 1865.

Winnowing. See AGRICULTURE.

Winslow, GORDON, M.D., D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Williston, Vt., in 1804. His preliminary education was acquired at Andover, Mass., and he graduated at Yale in both the collegiate and theological departments, becoming a Congregational minister. In 1836 he entered the Protestant Episcopal communion, and was ordained deacon in that year. His first parish was St. John's, Troy, N. Y., from which he went, in 1838, to Trinity Church, Elmira, N. Y.; and in 1841 became rector of St. Ann's Parish, Annapolis, Md. In 1845 he assumed the pastorate of St. Paul's Parish on Staten Island, and a few years after, though still rector of St. Paul's, was chaplain at the Quarantine. At the beginning of the Civil War he was appointed chaplain to the Fifth New York Regiment, and served two years. When the Sanitary Commission was established, he was its inspector for the Army of the Potomac. It was while accompanying his wounded son, Col. Cleveland Winslow, that he met with the accident which resulted in his death. He acted as aide-de-camp to Maj.-Gen. Warren in many battles. He died universally regretted, June 7, 1864, being drowned by falling overboard from a steamer near the mouth of the Potomac. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. Oct. 1864, p. 482.

Winslow, Hubbard, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, brother of Drs. Gordon and Myron, was born at Williston, Vt., Oct. 30, 1799. He prepared for college at Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass.; graduated at Yale College in 1825; studied theology at New Haven; preached at Litchfield, Conn., in 1827-28; was pastor of the First Congregational Church at Dover, N. H., from 1828 to 1831, and of the Bowdoin Street Church, Boston, from 1832 to 1844; travelled in Europe; was principal of the Mount Vernon Institute for Young Ladies, Boston, from 1844 to 1853; visited the educational institutions of Europe in 1853; edited for a time the Religious Magazine, besides contributing to various other periodicals; gained considerable repute as a polemical theologian; was much employed as a platform lecturer on various topics; preached to the First Presbyterian Church at Geneva, N. Y., from 1857 to 1859; became pastor of the Fifth Street Presbyterian Church, New York city, in 1861; and died at Williston, Vt., Aug. 13, 1864. He published, Controversial Theology (1832):—Discourses on the Nature, Evidence, and Moral Value of the Doctrine of the Trinity (1831):—Christianity Applied to our Social and Civil Duties (1835):—Young Man's Aid to Knowledge (1836):—Are You a Christian? an Aid to Self-examination (1836):—Mental Cultivation (1839):—Design and Mode of Baptism (1842):—The Christian Doctrines (1844):—Elements of Intellectual Philosophy (1851):—Elements of Moral Philosophy, Analytical, Synthetical (1856):—and other works.

Winslow, Myron, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Congregational missionary, was born at Williston, Vt., Dec. 11, 1789. He was of the same stock as the two governors Winslow of Massachusetts, and the Kenelm Winslow mentioned in the English history of the 16th century. At the age of fourteen he entered a store as a clerk, and finally established himself in business in Norwich, Conn. During this period he was converted, and convictions that he ought to preach to the unevangelized nations took hold upon him. Abandoning a profitable business, he entered college and graduated at Middlebury in 1813, and Andover Theological Seminary in 1818. He was ordained as a missionary in Salem, Mass., with Pliny Fisk and others, Nov. 4, 1818, and in the following year embarked at Boston, arriving at Calcutta in five months. He took up his residence in Oodooville, Ceylon, in 1820, where he labored seventeen years, founding a seminary and otherwise consolidating the mission. In 1836 he was transferred to Madras. His biography during his residence in India would be no less than the history of the missions there. He founded the Madras Mission; was general secretary and financial agent of that and other missions; was president of Madras College from 1840, and head of all the native schools; had the care of a native church of several hundred members; supervised the printing and editing of various educational and religious works in the Tamil language; and was at the time of his death the oldest missionary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He died at the Cape of Good Hope, on his way to America, Oct. 22, 1864.

Dr. Winslow wrote the following: History of Missions (Andover, 1819, 12mo, 432 pp.):—Hints on Missions to India (N. Y. 1856, 8vo):—A Comprehensive Tamil and English Dictionary of High and Low Tamil (Madras, 1862, 4to). "This work has received the encomiums of native, English, and American scholars, and ranks second to no other philological achievement of the age. Not merely for the profound scholarship displayed in its pages, but for the vast influence it exerts in civilizing and Christianizing India, has it called forth the thanks of the religious world. In the preparation and completion of this work, Dr. Winslow spent upwards of twenty years of continuous toil. It has one thousand pages, three columns to a page, and contains sixty-eight thousand words and definitions. Of these nearly half owe their lexicographic birth and position to the author. The dictionary contains the mythological, astrological, scientific, official, and poetic terms of the Tamil; names of heroes, gods, authors, etc., and geographical and historical information, thus forming an encyclopædia of Tamil learning." Dr. Winslow is said to have devoted more study to the Eastern languages than any other American. He also conducted a continuous correspondence for forty years with the Missionary Herald, N. Y. Observer, and other publications. Several Sermons and Addresses were published in pamphlet. Dr. Winslow was five times married. Memoirs of two of his wives and one of his children were published. See Cong. Quarterly, 1865, p. 209; Appletons' Annual Cyclop. 1864, p. 814; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Winstanley, THOMAS, D.D., a Church of England divine, was born in 1749. He studied at Brasenose College, and afterwards became fellow of Hertford. He took his degree of A.M. in 1774; published an edition of the Poetics of Aristotle; was appointed principal of St. Alban's Hall in 1797; took his degrees of B.D. and D.D. in 1798, and about this time became Laudian professor of Arabic, Camden professor of ancient history, and prebendary of St. Paul's. He died in September, 1823. See Christian Remembrancer, 1823, p. 628.

Winter (prop. חֶרֶף, sethân, Cant. ii, 11; but usually חֶרֶף, chôreph, which is strictly autumn, the season of ripeness; Gr. χειμών, the rainy season). In Palestine, part of autumn and the seasons of seed-time and cold, extending from the beginning of September to the beginning of March, were called winter (Gen. viii, 22; Psa. lxxiv, 17; Zech. xiv, 8; Jer. xxxvi, 22). The cold of winter is not usually very severe, though the north winds from the middle of December to the middle of February are exceedingly penetrating. Snow falls more or less, but seldom lies upon the ground, except in the mountains (Psa. cxlvii, 17). In shady places the ice will occasionally bear a man's weight, but thaws as soon as the sun rises upon it. In the plain of Jericho the winter is more genial than the spring of northern countries, while in the mountainous country around Jerusalem it is often more inclement than might be expected (Matt. xxiv, 20). In this season the most furious storms of hail are experienced all over the land; the brooks rise, and all their streams fill their channels, and thunder and lightning are frequent. Towards the end of January the fields become green, and there is every appearance of approaching spring. The last rains fall in the early part of April; it is still cold, but less so, and the spring may be said to have arrived (Cant. ii, 11). See CAL-ENDAR; PALESTINE; SEASON.

Winter, Robert, D.D., an English Dissenting minister, was born in London in 1762, and was pastor at New Court, Carey Street, from 1806 until his death, in 1833. He published Pastoral Letters on Nonconformity, and several single Sermons. See (Lond.) Gentleman's Magazine, 1833, ii, 277.

Winter, Samuel, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1603; became provost of Trinity College, Dublin, and died Dec. 29, 1666.

Wisdom (prop. חֵכֶם, chokmâh, sofía), in a general sense, is a comprehensive knowledge of things in their proper nature and relations, together with the power of combining them in the most useful manner. Among the Hebrews, the term "wisdom" comprehended a wide circle of virtues and mental endowments (Exod. xxviii, 3; xxxi, 6; 1 Kings iii, 28; iv, 29-34), and its precise import in the Scriptures can only be ascertained by a close attention to the context. See FOOT.

1. It is used to express the understanding or knowledge of things, both human and divine, chiefly in a practical and moral aspect, especially in the Psalms, Proverbs, and the book of Job. It was this wisdom which Solomon entreated and received of God, especially in a governmental sense.

2. It is put for ingenuity, skill, dexterity, as in the case of the artificers Bezaleel and Aholiab (Exod. xxxviii, 3; xxxi, 3).

3. Wisdom is used for subtlety, craft, stratagem, whether good or evil. Pharaoh dealt wisely with the Israelites (Exod. i, 10). Jonadab was very wise, i. e. subtle and crafty (2 Sam. xiii, 3). In Proverbs (xiv, 8) it is said, "The wisdom of the prudent is to understand his way."

4. It stands for doctrine, learning, experience, sagacity (Job xii, 2, 12; xxxviii, 37; Psa. cv, 22).

5. It is put sometimes for the skill or arts of magicians, wizards, fortune-tellers, etc. (Gen. xli, 8; Exod. vii, 11; Eccles. ix, 17; Jer. i, 35).

3. The wisdom or learning and philosophy current among the Greeks and Romans in the apostolic age, which stood in contrast with the simplicity of the Gospel, and tended to draw away the minds of men from divine truth, is called "fleshly wisdom" (2 Cor. i, 12), "wisdom of this world" (1 Cor. i, 20; iii, 19), and "wisdom of men" (ii, 5).

7. In respect to divine things, wisdom, i. e. knowledge, insight, deep understanding, is represented everywhere as a divine gift, including the idea of practical application, and is thus distinguished from theoretical knowledge (Acts vi, 10; 1 Cor. xii, 8; Eph. i, 17; Col. i, 9; 2 Tim. iii, 15; James i, 5; iii, 13, 15, 17).

WISDOM OF JESUS (SON OF SIRACH), BOOK OF. See ECCLESIASTICUS.

WISDOM (THE) OF SOLOMON, BOOK OF, one of the deuterocanonical portions of the Old Testament which have come down to us by tradition as the production of the son of David. Among the Apocryphal books unusual interest attaches to it on account of its supposed parallelism with some of the genuine writings of Solomon found in the sacred canon, especially the book of Ecclesiastes (q. v.). See APOCRYPHA.

1. Title and Position.—This book is called Σοφία Σαλωμών or Σαλωμώνος (Alex. Compl.), i. e. the Wisdom of Solomon, in the Sept.; and the Great Wisdom of Solomon in the Syriac version, because it was anciently believed to have been written by Solomon, who therein propounds the lessons of wisdom. It is denominated Πανέρως Σοφία, All-virtuous Wisdom, an appellation which, though also given to Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus, is especially given by Athanasius and Epiphanius to this book, because it treats more extensively of wisdom than either of the other so-called Solomonic productions. It is called ἡ Θεία Σοφία, Sapientia Dei, by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv, 16) and Origen (On Rom. vii, 14). In the Vulg. it is simply called Liber Sapientie, without the name of Solomon, because Jerome disputed the Solomonic authorship of it. The versions of the Reformation are divided between those appellations. Thus, in Luther's version (1536), the Geneva version (1560), the Bishops' Bible (1568), and the A. V. (1611) this book is called the Wisdom of Solomon, according to the Sept.; while the Zurich version (1531), Coverdale's Bible (1535), Matthew's Bible (1537), Cromwell's Bible (1539), and Cranmer's Bible (1540) denominate it The Book of Wisdom, after the Vulg.

The book is placed in the Sept. and in the Vulg. after the Song of Songs and before Ecclesiasticus, or immediately after the canonical productions of Solomon, since it was believed that it, too, proceeded from this monarch. Though all the translations of the Reformation followed the example of Luther's version in separating the deuterocanonical from the canonical books, yet they have deviated from their prototype in the order of the Apocrypha. Thus, while Luther, in his Bible, places this book between Judith and Tobit, the Zurich version—which, as usual, is followed by Coverdale, and he again by Cromwell's Bible, Matthew's Bible, the Bishops' Bible, and Cranmer's Bible, as well as the Geneva version and the A. V.—places it between the additions to Esther and Ecclesiasticus.

II. Design, Division, and Contents.—The object of this book is both parenetical and apologetical. It comforts and strengthens the faithful who are distracted by the inexplicable difficulties in the moral government of the world, by showing them that whatever sufferings and taunts they have to endure, both from their apostate brethren and their heathen oppressors, and however much the wicked and the idolaters may prosper here, the elect, in following the counsels of divine wisdom, will be able to look forward with joy to a future state of retribution, where the righteous Judge will render to the ungodly according to their deeds, and confer upon the godly a blissful immortality.

This purpose is developed in three sections, the contents of which are as follows:

1. The First Section (i, 1-vi, 21), which contains the real problem of the book, opens with an admonition to the magnates of the earth to follow the paths of righteousness, since God only reveals himself to and abides with those who are of an upright heart (i, 1-6), and duly registers the deeds of the wicked, which he will most assuredly bring before the bar of a future judgment (ver. 7-16). For although the wicked deny the immortality of the soul (ii, 1-6), indulge in the pleasures of this world (ver. 7-9), and persecute the righteous, defying God to defend them (ver. 10-24); and though the case of the godly seems almost forlorn, yet God exercises a special care over his people, whom he allows to be chastised in order to purify them (iii, 1-7), and has destined his saints to judge the nations of the earth, and to abide forever with their Lord (ver. 8, 9); while he has laid up condign punishment for the wicked (ver. 10-18). The wicked who have large families are therefore not to be envied, for their children only perpetuate their wickedness (iv, 1-7); while the righteous who are suddenly overtaken by death are not to be deplored, since honorable age is not to be measured by length of years, but by holiness of conduct, and since they are sometimes suddenly taken away to escape the snares of the wicked; thus showing that God's mercy is with his saints even in their untimely death, because they, having been perfected in their youth, though dead, speak condemnation to the wicked, who shall at last, in the great day of retribution, be constrained to confess it (ver. 8-20). For then the righteous shall triumph, and the wicked who shall witness it will confess with anguish of soul that they have acted foolishly and wickedly, and that those whom they have derided and persecuted in this life are really the children of God, enjoy a glorious immortality, and deal out terrible punishments on the ungodly (v, 1-23). Having shown that this is the doom of the wicked, Solomon reiterates in more earnest tones the warning to the magnates of the earth with which this section commences, seeing that the righteous Judge who invested them with the powers they possess will soon call them to the bar of his judgment, where there is no respect of persons (vi, 1-8); and tells them that the most effectual way to obey this warning is to learn divine wisdom, who is always ready to be found of those that seek her (ver. 9-14), who alone is the safest guide in this world, and leads to a union with the Creator in the world to come (ver. 15-21).

2. The Second Section (vi, 22-ix, 18) describes the nature of this wisdom, the blessings she secures, and the manner in which she is to be obtained, by the experience of Solomon, who recounts it himself in the first person. He tells us that, though an exalted monarch, he realized his mortality, and therefore prayed for wisdom (vi, 22-vii, 7). With this precious gift, which he preferred above thrones, riches, health, and beauty, come all other earthly blessings of which she is the mother (ver. 8-12). Through her he became the friend of God, whose she is, and who bestows her as a gift (ver. 13-16). By her aid he fathomed the mysteries of the changing seasons, of the heavenly bodies, and of the animal and vegetable kingdoms, as she herself is the maker of all things, and pervades all creation. She alone unites us to God with ties of friendship, and no vice can prevail against her (ver. 17-30). She, too, confers all earthly blessings, all intellectual and moral powers, as well as the ability to govern nations, and she can only be obtained from God in answer to prayer (viii, 1-21). Solomon then recites the prayer in answer to which he received this divine gift (ix, 1-18).

3. The Third Section (x, 1-xix, 22) describes the blessings which wisdom secured to the people of God, and the sore calamities which befell the ungodly who rejected her teaching, from the history of mankind, beginning with Adam and ending with the conquest of the Promised Land. Thus it shows how wisdom guided and protected the pious from Adam to Moses (x, 1-xi, 4); how the wicked who despised her counsels and afflicted the righteous were punished, as seen in the case of the Egyptians (xi, 5-xii, 1) and the Canaanites (xii, 2-27). As the chief sin of the Canaanites was idolatry, Solomon takes occasion to describe the origin, folly, and abominations of idolatry (xiii, 1-xv, 19), and then returns to describe the plagues of Egypt, which constitute an essential part of the history in question, thus showing the awful doom of the wicked and the great deliverance of the righteous (xvi, 1-xix, 22).

III. Unity and Integrity.—From the above analysis of its contents, it will be seen that the book forms a complete and harmonious whole; the grand problem discussed in the first section being illustrated in the second section by the experience of Solomon, and in the third section by the experience of God's people, detailed in chronological order. Indeed, the unity and integrity of the book were never questioned till the middle of the last century, when Houbigant (Prolegomena in Not. Crit. in Omnes V. T. Libros, i, p. ccxvi, ccxii) maintained that it consists of two parts, the first (ch. i-ix) being written by Solomon in Hebrew, and the second (ch. x-xix) being most probably an addition of the Greek translator of the first part. Eichhorn submits (Einleitung in d. Apokryph. p. 143 sq.) that the two parts, which belong to different authors, are i-xi, 1 and xi, 2-xix; or, if proceeding from the same author, that he must have written the second part in his younger years, before he divested himself of his national prejudices, and before his notions were enlarged by Greek philosophy. Bretschneider, again (De Libri Sap. Parte Priore), will have it that it consists of four different documents, the first of which (i, 1-vi, 8) is a fragment of a larger work originally written in Hebrew by a Palestinian Jew connected with the court of Antiochus Epiphanes; the second (vi, 9-x) was written in Greek at the time of Christ, by an Alexandrian Jew, who put sentiments of Greek philosophy into the mouth of Solomon in order to vindicate for the Jews the honor of having possessed all philosophic systems and sciences prior to every one else. The third (ch. xii-xix) was also written, at the time of Christ, by a common Jew, who possessed the crudest notions; while the fourth piece (xi, 1-26) was added by the compiler of the book to connect the second and third parts. These must suffice as specimens of the opinions entertained by some respecting the unity of this book. They are most ably and elaborately refuted by Grimm (Comment. p. 9-15).

The integrity of the book is not only impugned by those who dispute its unity, but by some who admit that it has a regularly developed plan. Thus Grotius will have it that it is imperfect and unfinished, having been mutilated by some accident of time; while Calmet, who also maintains that the book is unfinished, hesitates to decide whether the end was lost by accident or through the unfavorable circumstances of the times, or whether it was designedly omitted by the author himself. But a conclusion more apposite and more in harmony with the design of the book can hardly be imagined than xix, 22, in which the just reflection and moral lesson are enunciated as deduced from the whole treatise, that the righteous are under God's special care, and that he "assists them in every time and place." Equally untenable is the assertion that the book contains interpolations by a Christian hand. This assertion was first made by Grotius ("Christiana quadam commodis locis addidit," Pref. in Librum Sapientie), who in his Comment. specifies iv, 7, where he remarks, "Sed hæc, ut dixi, Evangelium magis redolent." Grätz (Geschichte der Juden [2d ed. Leips. 1863], iii, 443 sq.), who advocates the same opinion, adduces ii, 24; iii, 13; iv, 1; xiv, 7. But all these passages, when fairly interpreted, are perfectly consistent with Jewish sentiments; and we are almost sure that if the erudite Grätz had consulted Grimm's masterly commentary on the passages in question when preparing the second edition of the third volume of his History, he would not have reprinted so literally the remarks from the first edition on this subject.

IV. Philosophical and Doctrinal Character.—1. Though there are Platonic and Stoical sentiments in this book, yet it is not to be supposed that the author propounds therein a philosophical view of Judaism. The book of Wisdom contains no greater admixture of Greek elements than the post-Babylonian canonical writings contain of Persian elements. It is essentially based upon the truths embodied in the Old Test., whose spirit it breathes, and whose doctrines it sets forth as paramount, while the Greek sentiments are very subordinate, and are such as would almost enter spontaneously into the mind of any educated Jew residing in such a place as Alexandria.

The doctrines of divine and human wisdom (or objective and subjective wisdom, as it is termed) propounded in this book are simply amplifications and bolder personifications of what is to be found in Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus. This may be seen in the conception of divine wisdom being an emanation from, or the Spirit of God present with, the Deity before and during the creation of the world, and brooding over the elements of the unformed world (Wisd. vii, 22, 25; ix, 9, 17; comp. Prov. iii, 19; viii, 22-26; Job xxxiii, 4; Eccles. xxiv, 3); in the view that human wisdom proceeds from the primordial divine wisdom which permeates all finite and pure spirits (Wisd. vii, 25; comp. Job xxxii, 8; Prov. ii, 6; Eccles. i, 1), for which reason the two not unfrequently merge into one another (Wisd. vii, 12; viii, 6; x; comp. Prov. iii, 13-20; viii); that she is "the universitas litterarum," she teaches us all arts and sciences—cosmology, chronology, meteorology, astronomy, zoology, pneumatology, psychology, botany, pharmacy, politics, philosophy of history, parables, and enigmas (Wisd. vii, 17-21; viii, 8; comp. Exod. xxxi, 3; 1 Kings iii, 12; iv, 29-34), and the whole range of morals and spiritual virtues (Wisd. i, 1-18; x, 1-15; Prov. i, 7; iii). See the article preceding.

Not only does the author of this book derive his leading thoughts from the canonical Scriptures of the Old Test., but, as an orthodox Jew, he even espouses the traditions of his fathers. Thus in harmony with these traditions, which tell us that models of both the tabernacle and the temple were shown by God to Moses and Solomon, he speaks of the temple in Jerusalem as having been made after the model of the temple in heaven (comp. μυστηρια σακωνης αγιας ην προητοιμασας αν' αραρης [Wisd. ix, 8] with בית המקדש שלמשה מוכן [Menachoth, 29]; Rashi, On Erod. xxv, 9, 40; Heb. viii, 5). Ch. x, 19 b, which has occasioned great difficulty to interpreters, and which the Vulgate, Luther, the Zurich Bible, Coverdale's version, Matthew's Bible, Cromwell's Bible, Cranmer's Bible, the Geneva version, the Bishops' Bible, Grotius, Calmet, etc., take as antithetical to ver. 19 a, referring it to the Israelites whom wisdom brought forth from the depth of the sea—thus violating both its connection with the following verse, as indicated by διὰ τοῦτο and the sense of ἀναβράζειν, which is not to bring out, but to spit out, to cast out—is based upon a tradition which tells us that the sea spit out the corpses of the Egyptians when the Jews despoiled them of their weapons. This tradition is given in the Mechilla, the so-called Chaldee paraphrases of Jerusalem, and Jonathan ben-Uzziel, On Exod. xv, 12, and Pirke de Rabbi Eliezer, sect. xlii, and is at the basis of the account in Josephus (Ant. ii, 16, 6). Our author also follows tradition in his remark that it was not the turning to the brazen serpent, as stated in Numb. xxi, 9, but to God, which saved the Israelites (Wisd. xvi, 7; comp. Rosh hash-Shanah, 26; Jerusalem Targum; and Rashi, On Numb. xxi, 9); that the manna (Numb. xi, 8) had all manner of pleasant tastes (Wisd. xvi, 20, 21; comp. Yoma, 75); that prayers must be offered to God before the sun rises (Wisd. xvi, 28; comp. Mishna, Berakoth, i, 2); that Sodom was destroyed because its inhabitants were inhospitable to strangers (Wisd. xix, 17, 18; comp. Sanhedrin, 109), etc.

With these facts before us, we entirely differ from Gröner (Philo, ii, 207 sq.), Dähne (Jüd.-alexand. Religionsphilos. ii, 153 sq.), and others, who maintain that the author of this book derived his leading tenets from Alexandrian, and more especially from Platonic, philosophy, and fully concur with Ewald (iv, 549), who remarks "that no one who is intimately acquainted with the Old Test., as well as with our author, will say that he derived the doctrine of immortality from the above-named source. The specification of the σωφροσύνη, φρόνησις, δικαιοσύνη, and ἀνδρεία as the four cardinal virtues, both here (Wisd. viii, 7) and by Philo (ii, 455 sq.; 4 Macc. i, 18 sq.; v, 22 sq. [where ἐνείκελα is put for φρόνησις]; xv, 7, where there is a similar change) is indeed real Platonic, and is derived entirely from the Platonic school. But even these four virtues appear in viii, 7 as merely secondary, and in the whole connection of the treatment of the book as accidental." Welte (Einleitung, p. 163 sq.), indeed, who does not dispute the agreement of the book of Wisdom with Alexandrian philosophy, goes so far as to say that it only refers to such things as are also more or less clearly expressed in the canonical books of the Hebrew Scriptures.

2. In its religious doctrines the book of Wisdom is one of the most important and interesting contributions to the literature of the Jewish theology before the advent of Christ. It shows how the tenets of the Jews were preparing them for the teachings of the New Test. Thus it tells us that God is not the author of death, but made both man and all creatures in the image of his own eternity, and delighted in the whole of his creation (i, 13, 14; xi, 24), which he made for perpetual duration (ii, 14; comp. Rom. viii, 20, 21). Death entered into the world through the envy of the devil (Wisd. ii, 24). We have here the first instance on record where the serpent which tempted the protoplasts in Paradise is identified with the devil (ver. 24), thus confirming the explanation given of Gen. iii, 1-15 in John viii, 44; Rev. xii, 9; xx, 2. Grätz (Gesch. iii, 443 sq.), who cannot brook so striking a confirmation on the part of the Jews before Christ to the correctness of the teachings of the New Test., will have it that this is one of the passages interpolated by a Christian hand. But there is very little doubt that the Jews believed in the identity of the serpent and Satan long before the advent of Christ (comp. Ginsburg, The Kabbalah [Lond. 1865], p. 29), and that this notion has even passed over into the Persic religion (comp. Hengstenberg, Christology, i, 7 sq., Engl. transl.).

The book of Wisdom, moreover, shows that the doctrine of immortality and a future judgment was most emphatically believed and was generally current among the Jews (i, 15; iii, 4; vi, 18, 19; viii, 17); that the Israelites believed that the wicked attract death by their sinful deeds (i, 16); that the saints, who are the children of God (ii, 13, 16, 18), will ultimately judge the world and rule over the nations thereof (iii, 8; comp. Matt. xix, 28; 1 Cor. vi, 2; Rev. ii, 26; iii, 21; xx, 4-6). The author of this book also propounds the doctrine of the pre-existence of the soul (viii, 20). This, however, he did not derive direct from Platonism, both because the manner in which he enunciates it is different from the mode in which it is represented by Plato and Philo, and because this doctrine was held by the Essenes in Palestine and is to be found in the Talmud (comp. Josephus, War, ii, 8, 11; the Talmud, Chagiga, 12 b; Yebamoth, 62; Aboda Sara, 5; Ginsburg, The Kabbalah, p. 31 sq.). The body is regarded as the seat of sin (i, 4; viii, 20) and as a mere hindrance and prison of the soul (ix, 15; comp. 2 Cor. v, 1-4; Josephus, War, ii, 8, 11). No trace, however, is to be found in this book of a resurrection of the body or of a personal Messiah.

V. Author and Date.—1. As the book itself ascribes the words therein contained to Solomon, and represents him as narrating his personal experience (ch. vii-xix), the book of Wisdom has come down to us by tradition as the production of this great monarch. Thus it is not only expressly described as the work of this wise king in the inscriptions of the most ancient versions (viz. Sept., Syriac, Arabic, etc.), but it is quoted as such by the most ancient fathers of the Church, such as Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi), Tertullian (De Præscr. Hæres. c. 7; Adv. Valent. c. 2), Hippolytus (p. 66, ed. Lagarde), Cyprian (Exhortat. Mart. xii), etc. The Solomonian authorship has also been maintained by some very learned Jews—viz. De' Rossi (Meor Enajim [ed. Vienna, 1829], p. 281 b), Wessely (Introduction to his Comment. on Wisdom), and by some Protestants. With the exception of Schmid (Das Buch d. Weisheit übersetzt und erklärt [Vienna, 1858]), and one or two others, critics of the present day have entirely discarded this view, for the following reasons: (1.) The book was written in Greek, and in the later style of this language. (2.) Its author exhibits a Greek culture which no Palestinian Jew possessed even at the time of Greek ascendancy over Judæa, as is evident from the later Palestinian writings, and from the express declaration of Josephus (Ant. xx, 11, 2) that his brethren had an aversion to Greek education. The Greek culture of the author of the book of Wisdom is seen in his notions of what constitutes knowledge (vii, 17-20; viii, 8); in his acquaintance with the Epicurean doctrine of fate and the philosophico-materialistic view of nature and the future destiny of the soul (ii, 2); in the distinction which he makes between the nobler and educated features of heathenism and its grosser forms (xiii, 1-15); in his view of the origin of image-worship (xiv, 14 sq.), etc. Comp. Grimm, Comment. p. 19, etc. (3.) It contains unquestionable quotations from the Sept. This is not only evident from ordinary passages, as vi, 7; xi, 4; xii, 8; xvi, 22; xix, 21; but from extraordinary instances where the Sept. differs from the Hebrew, and where the words of the former are inwrought into the text itself; e. g. Wisdom ii, 12 puts into the mouth of sceptics the words of Isa. iii, 10, ἐνεδρεύσωμεν τὸν δίκαιον ὅτι ἐδύσχηστος ἡμῖν ἵστι, according to the Sept., which essentially differs from the Hebrew text; and Wisd. xv, 10, σπουδὸς ἡ καρδία αὐτοῦ, which, again, is an important variation of the Sept. on Isa. xlv, 20 from the Hebrew. (4.) It refers to matters of history (Wisd. ii, 1-6, 8; xv, 4), which are inapplicable to Solomon's period (Grimm, Comment. p. 17).

Next in point of antiquity is the theory that Philo is the author of this book, as is seen from the remark of Jerome, "Nonnulli scriptorum veterum hunc esse Philonis Judæi affirmant" (Pref. in Libr. Sal.). This view was also adopted by De Lyra, Luther, Rainold, Calovius, bishop Cosin, and others. But against it it is to be urged that the whole complexion of the book, as well as its historical, theological, and philosophical elements, is at variance with this hypothesis. Thus—(1.) The formation of the fetus in the mother's womb is at variance with Philo's notions upon the same subject (Wisd. vii, 2; comp. Philo, De Mundi Opif. in Opp. ii, 15). (2.) The two kinds of pre-existent souls—viz. good and bad—are described in this book as destined alike to inhabit human bodies, whereas Philo only lets the sinfully disposed souls occupy human bodies, and says that the good souls aid the Deity in the administration of human affairs (Wisd. viii, 19; comp. Philo, De Giganti, in Opp. i, 263). (3.) In this book it is distinctly declared that the Egyptians were punished with serpents, which Philo as distinctly denies (Wisd. xi, 15; xvii, 9; comp. Philo, De Vit. Mos. in Opp. ii, 97 sq.). (4.) The darkness with which the Egyptians were visited is described in this book as having proceeded from the infernal regions, while Philo affirms that it was occasioned by an unusual eclipse of the sun (Wisd. xvii, 14; comp. Philo, De Vit. Mos. i, 21). (5.) The view that the serpent which tempted our first parents is the devil is diametrically opposed to that of Philo, who does not recognise such an evil power in the world, and regards the serpent as a symbol of pleasure (Wisd. ii, 24; comp. Philo, De Mundi Opif. in Opp. i, 38). (6.) The description of the origin of idolatry in this book is totally different from that of Philo (Wisd. xii, xiii; comp. Philo, De Monarch. § 1-3, in Opp. ii, 213 sq.). (7.) The idea of divine wisdom, which in the centre of this book is different from that of Philo. The author of the book of Wisdom manifests no acquaintance whatever with the trichotomy of human knowledge, nor even with the doctrine of ideas, which forms a most essential and organic part of Philo's system, as is evident from the fact that he makes no allusion thereunto in such passages as i, 3; viii, 19 sq.; ix, 15; and especially vii, 22 sq., where it would have been most appropriate, and where it would undoubtedly have been found, had the writer known the points in question.

The force of these arguments against Philo Judæus, and yet the unwillingness to relinquish the traditional name, have led many Roman Catholics and some Protestant scholars (viz. Lorinus, Bellarmine, Huetius, Drusus, Wernsdorf, Buddens, etc.) to resort to the theory that it was not the well-known philosopher, but an older Philo, who either composed the book of Wisdom or put it into its present form. But the fatal objection to this is that the elder Philo was, according to the express testimony of Josephus (Contra Apion. i, 23), a heathen, and could not therefore have written this book.

Still more far-fetched is the theory of Dr. Tregelles, that it was written by an unknown Christian of the name of Philo, basing it upon the passage "et Sapientia ab amicis Salomonis in honorem ipsius scripta" in the Muratorian canon, which he imagines to be a mistranslation of the Greek original, that may have read, καὶ ἡ Σοφία Σαλομῶντος ὑπὸ Φίλωνος, instead of ὑπὸ Φίλωνος (Journal of Philol. 1855, p. 37 sq.).

Being thus compelled to relinquish the name of Philo in whatsoever form, Augustine would at first have it that Jesus, son of Sirach, was the author of this book (De Doctr. Chr. ii, 8), but afterwards retracted his opinion (Retract. ii, 4; De Civ. Dei. xvii, 20, 1).

Faber, again, maintained (Prousiones de Libro Sap. [Anspach, 1776-77], i-vi, pt. v) that it was written by Zerubbabel, who might justly call himself the second Solomon, because he restored the Solomonic temple. But as all the arguments against the Solomonic authorship are equally to be urged against this theory; and, moreover, as ix, 3 can only be applied to Solomon, and as the whole tone of the book shows that this monarch is meant, Faber's conjecture has not been espoused by any one else.

Neither can the more plausible theory of Lutterbeck (Die neutestamentl. Lehrbegriffe [Mayence, 1852], i, 407 sq.) be sustained, that Aristobolus (flourished B.C. 150) wrote it. Because (1.) He was a favorite of Ptolemy VI Philometor, and would therefore not have inveighed against kings (comp. vi, 1 sq.). (2.) The Jews in Egypt enjoyed the greatest distinctions under this monarch, and were treated with the highest confidence, so much so that Philometor and Cleopatra intrusted the government and the army to Jews (Josephus, Contra Apion. ii, 5), whereas the Jews in Egypt suffered under the most grinding oppression when this book was written (xi, 5 sq.; xii, 23 sq.; xvi-xix; Grimm, Comment. p. 21). For these reasons modern writers have given up all attempts to discover the author's name.

2. Equally divergent are the opinions of commentators and historians respecting the date of the book, as will be seen from the following table:

Sept., the Syriac and Arabic versions, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, etc.	B.C. cir. 1000
Faber	" 500
Grotius	" 450-300
Welte, Brück	" 222-217
Gutman, Lutterbeck, Davidson	" 150-130
Grimm	" 145-50
Some ancient fathers, De Lyra, Luther, bishop Cosin, Grätz, etc.	A.D. cir. 30-50

All, however, that can be deduced from internal evidence upon this subject is that (1) the author of the book was an Alexandrian Jew, or that he resided in Egypt and wrote for his coreligionists in the land of their former bondage, as is evident from the details of the Egyptian animal-worship (xi, 15; xii, 24; xv, 18 sq.); from the involuntary adoption of certain Alexandrian notions and phrases as shown above; from the allusion to the events in the lives of sundry Jewish worthies without specifying the names of these patriarchs—viz. to the directing of the course of the righteous in a piece of wood of small value (i. e. Noah and his family in the ark; comp. Wisd. x, 4 with Gen. vii, 1 sq.); to the preservation of the righteous man blameless unto God (i. e. Noah); to the saving of the righteous man (i. e. Lot) from the burning of the cities (Wisd. x, 5 sq.; comp. Gen. xix, 15 sq.), which could only be made by a Jew, and only be understood by Jews; and from the exalted terms in which he speaks of the Jewish nation, of the permanent obligations of the Mosaic law, and of Palestine (Wisd. ii, 12; iii, 8; xii, 7); and from the Haggadic embellishments of the Old-Test. narratives, as has been shown in the preceding part of this article. These facts, therefore, completely set aside the opinion of Kirschbaum (Der jüd. Alexandrinismus [Leips. 1841], p. 52), Weisse (Ueber die Zukunft d. evangel. Kirche [ibid. 1849], p. 233), Noak (Der Ursprung des Christenthums [ibid. 1837], i, 222 sq.), etc., that this book is the work of a Christian hand; and that (2) he wrote after the Sept. (i. e. Ptolemy II Philadelphus, B.C. 284-246), for, as we have seen, he quotes the Pentateuch and Isaiah according to this version. He, however, composed it some time before Philo (B.C. cir. 140-50), since it required a considerable period for the degree of development which the religious philosophy of Alexandria had attained among the Jews in the interval between the author of Wisdom and the writings of Philo. The sufferings referred to in this book (xi, 5 sq.; xii, 23 sq.; xvi-xix) are most probably those which Ptolemy VII Physcon (B.C. 145-117) heaped upon the Jews in Alexandria (comp. Josephus, Contra Apion. ii, 5; see Grätz, Geschichte der Juden [2d ed.], iii, 66). The hypothesis of Dr. Rainold (Cens. Libr. Apocr.), that "it was written in the time of the emperor Caius, who would have his statue set up and adored in the temple of Jerusalem (Suetonius Vit. Calig. § 22), and that xiv, 16-20 deprecates his blasphemous attempt at self-deification," which is followed by Noak (Der Ursprung des Christenthums, i, 222 sq.) and Grätz (Geschichte der Juden, iii, 442), is based upon precarious interpretation of this passage. Grimm (Comment. p. 33) has conclusively shown that it gives the writer's opinion respecting idolatry, which he, in common with many learned heathen of his day, traces to the deification of man, as is evident from the fact that several Seleucideans adopted the epithet θεός (2 Macc. xi, 25), and that Ptolemy Lagi and Berenice, his consort, were apotheosized by their successors and subjects giving them the title θεοὶ σωτῆρες, and erecting to them altars and temples (Pauly, Real-Encyclop. d. class. Alterthumswissen. s. v. "Ptolemäus," VI, i, 190).

VI. Original Language and Style.—Believing it to be the work of Solomon, many of the ancient fathers, and several modern writers, both Jews and Protestants, as a matter of course, maintained that the original language of Wisdom was Hebrew. Even Grotius, though not regarding it as the production of Solomon, believed it to have been originally written in Hebrew, while Houbigant advocated a Hebrew original for the first nine chapters, and Bretschneider and Engelbrecht restricted it to the first five chapters. The erudite Azariah de' Rossi again would have it that Solomon wrote it in Aramaic in order to send it to some king in the extreme East (Meor Enajim [ed. Vienna, 1829], 281 b). But Jerome had already declared that there was no Hebrew original extant of this book, and that it was originally written in Greek, as is evident from its style ("Secundus [qui Sapientia Salomonis inscribitur] apud Hebræos nusquam est, quin et ipse stylus Græcam eloquentiam redolet" [Pref. in Libr. Sal.]). This remark is fully borne out by (1.) The numerous compound expressions, especially adjectives (e. g. κακότηχος, i, 4; xv, 4; πρωτόπλαστος, vii, 1; x, 1; ὑπέρμαχος, x, 20; xvi, 17; comp. also i, 6; ii, 10; iv, 8; v, 22; vii, 1, 3; ix, 5, 15; x, 3; xi, 17; xii, 5, 19; and for ἄπαι λέγόμενα, xi, 7; xiii, 3; xiv, 25; xv, 8, 9; xvi, 3, 21), which have no corresponding terms in the Hebrew. (2.) The technical expressions—as πνεῦμα νοερόν, vii, 22; διήκειν καὶ χωρεῖν διὰ πάντων, vii, 24; ἕλη ἀμωρος, xi, 17; πρόνοια, xiv, 3; xvii, 2—which are derived from Platonic and Stoical philosophy. (3.) The alliterations, paranomasias, and oxymora which pervade the book (comp. ἀγαπήσατε—φρονήσατε—ζητήσατε; ἐν ἀγαθότητι—ἀπλόγητι, i, 1; οὐς—θροῦς, i, 10; παροδείσω—συνοδείσω, vi, 22; ἀδολῶς—ἀφθόνως, vii, 13; ἀργά—ἔργα, xiv, 5; ἀδικα—δική, i, 8; ἰδίας ἰδιότητος, ii, 23; ἀτραπὸν τρόπιος, v, 10; δυνατοὶ δὲ δυνατοί, vi, 6; ὅσινα τὰ ὅσια ἰσχυρίζονται, vii, 10, k. r. l.; see Grimm, p. 7), showing beyond doubt that the book was originally written in Greek. As to the Hebrew coloring of the language, the lexical Hebraisms (e. g. ἀπλότης καρδίας, i, 1; μερίς, κληρος, ii, 9; τρίβου, ii, 15; λογίζεσθαι εἰς τι, ii, 16; πληροῦν χρόνον, iv, 13; ἅσιοι τοῦ θεοῦ, iv, 15), the numerous Hebrew parallels, etc., these are to be expected from so thorough an Israelite as the writer of this book manifestly was, especially when it is borne in mind that the author breathes throughout the whole of his work the spirit of the Old Test.; that the book of Wisdom is a Hellenistic version of the same tradition wherein Solomon is represented as having philosophically refuted scepticism and tyranny, of which traces appear elsewhere in the later Jewish literature; and that the author took the ancient Hebrew poetry for his model.

The style of the book is very uneven. Some portions of it are truly sublime, and will bear comparison with any passages in the best classics; as, for instance, the delineation of the sensualist (ii, 1 sq.), the picture of future judgment (v, 15 sq.), and the description of wisdom (vii, 22–viii, 1); while in other passages the author, as bishop Lowth remarks, "is often pompous and turgid as well as tedious and diffuse, and abounds in epithets, directly contrary to the practice of the Hebrews" (Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, Prælect. p. xxiv).

VII. Canonicity and Authority.—Though the book of Wisdom, like the other deuterocanonical books, was never included in the canon of the synagogue, as is evident from the list of the Hebrew Scriptures given in the Talmud (Baba Bathra, § 14); and though it is not found in the catalogues of Origen, Jerome, Epiphanius, Athanasius, Cyril, etc., yet there can be but little doubt that it was held in great respect among the Jews, and that the apostle Paul was familiar with its language, as may be seen from the striking parallels in Rom. ix, 21 to Wisd. xv, 7; in Rom. ix, 22 to Wisd. xii, 20; in Eph. vi, 13–

17 to Wisd. v, 17–19. The next allusion to it, though also not by name, is to be found in the epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians (i, 27; comp. Wisd. xi, 22; xii, 12); and Eusebius tells us (Hist. Eccles. v, 26) that Irenæus made use of it in a lost book. Clement of Alexandria quotes it as the inspired work of Solomon with the introductory phrase ἡ Σοφία λέγει (Strom. iv, 16, p. 609, ed. Potter). It is also quoted as such by Origen (Contra Celsum, iii, 72), Tertullian (Advers. Valent. c. ii), Cyprian (Ezhortat. Martyr. 12), Cyril (Catech. ix, 127), etc. Hence it was declared as canonical by the third Council of Carthage (A.D. 397), in the councils of Sardis (A.D. 347), Constantinople in Trullo (A.D. 692), Toledo (A.D. 675), Florence (1438), and in the fourth session of the Council of Trent (1546). With other deuterocanonical writings, it remained in the canon till the time of the Reformation, when Luther first separated it and put it together with the rest of the Apocrypha at the end of the Old Test. Still Luther spoke of it with great respect (Vorrede auf die Weisheit Salomonis in his translation of the Bible, ed. 1534). In the Anglican Church the book of Wisdom is looked upon with still greater favor. Thus chapters xiii, xiv are quoted in the Homilies as the writing of Solomon (Sermon against Peril of Idolatry, pt. iii); vii, 11, 16; ix, 13; xiii, 1; xvi, 8, are cited as the work of the same wise man (Sermons for Rogation Week, pt. i–iii); iii, 1; xiii–xv, are quoted as Scripture (Sermon against the Fear of Death, pt. iii; Against Idolatries, pt. i and iii); and ch. v is referred to as Holy Scripture (Against Wilful Rebellion, pt. vi). See DEUTEROCANONICAL.

VIII. Text.—The book of Wisdom is preserved in Greek and Latin texts, and in subsidiary translations into Syriac, Arabic, and Armenian. Of these latter, the Armenian is said to be the most important; the Syriac and Arabic versions being paraphrastic and inaccurate (Grimm, Einleit. § 10). The Greek text, which, as appears above, is undoubtedly the original, offers no remarkable features. The variations in the MSS. are confined within narrow limits, and are not such as to suggest the idea of distinct early recensions; nor is there any appearance of serious corruptions anterior to existing Greek authorities. The Old Latin version, which was left untouched by Jerome (Pref. in Libr. Sal., "In eo libro qui a plerisque Sapientia Salomonis inscribitur . . . calamo temperavi; tantummodo canonicas Scripturas emendare desiderans, et studium meum certis magis quam dubiis commendare"), is, in the main, a close and faithful rendering of the Greek, though it contains some additions to the original text, such as are characteristic of the old version generally. Examples of these additions are found: i, 15, Injustitia autem mortis est acquisitio; ii, 8, Nullum pratum sit quod non pertranseat luxuria nostra; ver. 17, et sciens quæ erunt novissima illius; vi, 1, Melior est sapientia quam vires, et vir prudens quam fortis. And the construction of the parallelism in the two first cases suggests the belief that there, at least, the Latin reading may be correct. But other additions point to a different conclusion: vi, 23, diligite lumen sapientie omnes qui præestis populo; viii, 11, et facies principum mirabuntur me; ix, 19, quicunque placuerit tibi domine a principio; xi, 5, a defectione potus sui, et in eis cum abundarent filii Israel letati sunt.

The chief Greek MSS. in which the book is contained are the Codex Sinaiticus (N), the Cod. Alexandrinus (A), the Cod. Vaticanus (B), and the Cod. Ephraemi rescr. (C). The entire text is preserved in the three former; in the latter, only considerable fragments: viii, 5–xi, 10; xiv, 19–xvii, 18; xviii, 24–xix, 22.

Sabatier used four Latin MSS. of the higher class for his edition: "Corbeiensens duos, unum Sangermanensem, et alium S. Theodorici ad Remos," of which he professes to give almost a complete (but certainly not a literal) collation. The variations are not generally important, but patristic quotations show that in early times very considerable differences of text existed. An important MS. of the book in the British Museum (Egerton, 1046, Sæc. viii) has not yet been examined.

IX. Literature.—The earliest commentary which remains is that of Rabanus Maurus (died 856). Roman Catholic commentaries are those of Nannius (1552), Jansen (1557, 1614), Osorius (1580), Lorinus (1607, 1624), De Castro (1613), Corn. à Lapide (1638), Maldonatus (1643), Gorse (1655), Menochius (1678), Du Hamel (1703), Calmet (1757), Dereser (Frankf. 2d ed. 1825), and J. A. Schmid (Wien, 1858). Among Protestants separate commentaries are those of Strigel (Lips. 1569, 1571, 1575), Raynold (1618), Fabricius (Frœf. et Lips. 1691), Selnecker (Lips. 1575), Brochmann (Hafn. 1656), all in Latin; Petersen, Erklär. (Büding. 1727); Schubaud, Anmerk. (Magdeb. 1733); Steinmetz, Anmerk. (Leips. 1747); Kleuker, Erläut. (Riga, 1785); Hasse, Anmerk. (Jen. eod.); Wallenius, Anmärkningan (Griefsw. 1786, also in Latin); Kelle, Anmerk. (Freib. 1815); Engelbroth, Interpretation [ch. i-iv] (Havn. 1816); Bauermeister, Commentarius (Götting. 1828); and especially W. Grimm, Commentar (Leips. 1837; also in the Kurzegef. Exeg. Handb. ibid. 1868). To these may be added the Hebrew commentary by Wessely (Berl. 1780, and later). See also Ewald, Geschichte des Volkes Israel (Göttingen, 1852), iv, 548 sq.; Grätz, Geschichte der Juden (2d ed. Leips. 1863), iii, 292 sq., 242 sq.; and the Introductions to the Old Test. by Bertholdt (Erlangen, 1815), v, 225 sq.; De Wette, § 312-315; Keil (ibid. 1859), § 244-246; and Davidson (Lond. 1863), iii, 396-410. See COMMENTARY.

Wiseman, Luke Houlst, M.A., a Wesleyan Methodist minister, was born in the city of Norwich, Jan. 19, 1822. He "was a saint at twelve and a preacher at fourteen." He entered the ministry in 1840; was elected missionary secretary in 1868, a position which he held until the close of life; was raised to the presidential chair at the London Conference of 1872 by the largest number of votes ever recorded at such an election; and died in London, in the midst of his work and honors, Feb. 3, 1875. "As a Christian, he had deep veneration for the spiritual nature of Christianity; as a man, a love of freedom that amounted to a passion. Hence to contend for the rights of conscience, to enlarge the sphere of free action, and to assert liberty of difference among Christian churches while promoting fraternal union and co-operation, and independence of the commonwealth while maintaining patriotic loyalty and an enlightened citizenship, were to him the most sacred of all duties, and he ever discharged them with matchless courage and fearless independence. As an administrator, Wiseman had learned to combine in the happiest manner the fortiter in re with the suaviter in modo. . . Never flurried, never in a hurry—always at ease and at home, courteous to all, servile and obsequious to none—he succeeded in guiding skillfully the course of discussion and business, and in uniformly maintaining Christian courtesy and urbanity with judicial fairness and impartiality. Such was Wiseman—a man of open soul and loving heart, massive alike in body and mind, with a splendid physique and a character to match—a universal favorite with preachers and people, admired, trusted, loved by all. . . His heart was too high for pettiness, too large for selfishness or envy. Faith without superstition or fear, religion without bigotry or cant, the grandeur of intellect covered with the sincerity of childhood, were found in him as found in few" (Lond. Watchman; see N. Y. Methodist, March 20, 1875). Wiseman passionately loved the missionary cause. He eloquently advocated it and unselfishly worked for it. Like Frankland, Perks, Coley, and other eminent men in the British Conference, he worked too hard, and his sudden death was at once a surprise and a warning. Besides occasional published Sermons, Wiseman wrote, Lectures on Industries Prompted by Conscience, and Not by Covetousness (1852; 3d ed. 1858);—The Employment of Leisure Time (Lond. 1856, 12mo);—Things Secular and Things Sacred (ibid. eod.);—Agents in the Revival of the Last Century (ibid. 1855);—Men of Faith, or Sketches from the Book of Judges (ibid. 8vo);—Thoughts on Class Meetings and their Improvement (ibid. 1854, 12mo);—Christ in the Wilderness: Practical Views of our Lord's Temptation (ibid. 1857, 12mo). Wiseman, Nicholas Patrick Stephen, Cardinal, and chief of the Roman Catholic Church in England, was born at Seville, Spain, Aug. 2, 1802, of Irish and Spanish extraction. At an early age he was brought to England, and placed in St. Cuthbert's College, at Ushaw, near Durham. He was thence removed to the English College at Rome, where he was ordained a priest, and made a doctor of divinity. He was a professor for a time in the Roman University, and was then made rector of the English College at Rome. In 1828 he published his Horæ Syriacæ. Dr. Wiseman returned to England in 1835, and in the winter of that year delivered a series of lectures upon the leading doctrines of the Catholic Church at the Sardinian Chapel, in Lincoln's Inn Fields. About the same time he delivered his Lectures on the Connection between Science and Revealed Religion, for which he is best known in Protestant literature. He subsequently repaired to Rome, and is understood to have been instrumental in inducing pope Gregory XVI to increase the vicars-apostolic in England. The number was doubled, and Dr. Wiseman came back as coadjutor bishop to Dr. Walsh, of the Midland District. He was also appointed president of St. Mary's College, Oscott. In 1847 he again repaired to Rome on the affairs of the English Catholics, and prepared the way for the subsequent change resolved on in 1848, which was delayed by the troubles that ensued at Rome. He was now made pro-vicar-apostolic of the London district in place of Dr. Griffiths, deceased. Subsequently he was appointed coadjutor, cum jure successionis, to Dr. Walsh, who was translated to London; and in 1849, on the death of Dr. Walsh, he became vicar-apostolic of the London district. In August he went again to Rome, "not expecting," as he said, "to return to England again." But in a consistory held on Sept. 30, 1850, he was elected to the dignity of cardinal by the title of St. Pudentiana, and was appointed archbishop of Westminster, a step which raised an angry controversy in the papers, and resulted in the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. He died in London, Feb. 15, 1865. Dr. Wiseman was a moderate polemic, a fine scholar, an elegant orator, and an accomplished critic. He was from the first one of the chief contributors to, and joint editor of, the Dublin Quarterly Review, and is the author of numerous pamphlets bearing more or less directly on the religious controversies of the past quarter of a century. His Essays have been reprinted in three vols. 8vo. He also published, Lectures on the Eucharist:—Recollections of the Last Four Popes:—Fabiola; or, The Church of the Catacombs, etc. Dr. Wiseman was the seventh English cardinal since the Reformation. The other six were Pole, Allen, Howard, York (a son of the Pretender, who was never in England), Weld, and Acton. Archbishop Wiseman's successor was cardinal Manning, the present incumbent.

Wishart, George (1), called "The Martyr," a champion of the Reformation in Scotland, is supposed to have been a son of James Wishart, of Pittarow, justice-clerk during the reign of James V. The time of his birth is not known. He was master of a grammar-school at Montrose at the beginning of the 16th century. He began to preach the doctrines of the Reformation at Montrose, but was compelled to fly to England on account of the opposition of the enemies of that movement. He preached the same doctrines at Bristol in 1538, but was forced to recant and publicly burn his fagot. In 1543 we find him at Cambridge, and during the same year he returned to Scotland. The Reformation having gained some power, and having a head for the protection of its members, he preached more boldly in Dundee, Perth, Montrose, and Ayr, creating popular tumults. He was implicated in an attempt to take the life of cardinal Beaton, but no positive proof has been brought to sustain the charge. While preaching at various places in the neighborhood of Edinburgh, he was apprehended by the cardinal's troops, conveyed to St. Andrews, tried for heresy, condemned to be burned at the stake, and executed March 28, 1546. See Rogers, Life of George Wishart, etc. (1876); Mackenzie, Lives of Scots Writers, iii, 9-19.

Wishart, George (2), D.D., a Scotch divine, was born at Yeater, East Lothian, in 1609. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh; became a parish minister at North Leith and St. Andrews, where he refused to take the Covenant in 1639, for which refusal he was deprived of his living and imprisoned; made his way to Newcastle, England, where he was captured by the Scottish army in October, 1644, and taken to Edinburgh and thrown into the common jail, where he remained several months and suffered great hardships; joined the marquis of Montrose, to whom he became chaplain, and narrowly escaped execution with him in 1650; became chaplain to Elizabeth, the electress-palatine, and accompanied her to England at the Restoration in 1660; was then made rector of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and consecrated bishop of Edinburgh in 1662. He died at Edinburgh in 1671. He published an elegant Latin history of the Wars of Montrose (1647), which was hung by a cord to the neck of the marquis at his execution. He left a second part, bringing the history down to the death of Montrose, which was never published in its original form, but a number of excellent translations of the whole work have been published at later dates. See Keith, Catalogue of the Bishops of Scotland; Lyon, Hist. of St. Andrews, ii, 10-12.

Wishart, William, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was born at Dalkeith in 1657. He was educated at Utrecht; became one of the ministers at South Leith after the Revolution; afterwards principal of the University of Edinburgh, and one of the city ministers in 1716. He died in 1727. He published several single Sermons:—some collections of Sermons:—and Principles of Liberty of Conscience (1739).

Wisner, Benjamin Blydenburg, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Goshen, N. Y., Sept. 29, 1794. Under Rev. Dr. Axtell, of Geneva, N. Y., he acquired his preparatory training. In 1810 he joined the sophomore class in Union College, from which he graduated in 1813. For one year he was principal of an academy at Johnstown, when he returned home and began to study law. From 1815 to 1818 he was tutor in Union College, and during this time he studied theology under professor Andrew Yates, D.D. Resigning his tutorship, he entered the theological seminary at Princeton in 1818. In June, 1820, he was licensed to preach, and received a call to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church at New Brunswick, N. J., which he declined; was ordained pastor of the Old South Church, Boston, Mass., Feb. 21, 1821, where he continued to serve during twelve years. From October, 1832, he labored as the secretary for the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, travelling extensively throughout the Union to establish new missionary organizations, etc. He died in Boston, Feb. 9, 1835. He was a member of the board of directors of the American Education Society, and was a trustee of the Andover Theological Seminary. His executive talent was undoubted, and he did not lack ability as an extemporaneous debater. His style as a writer was not imaginative nor particularly felicitous, but he was a man of commanding influence. Dr. Wisner published, Three Discourses on the History of the Old South Church:—A Sermon on the Benefits of Sunday-schools:—and a Memoir of Mrs. Huntington. He also contributed to the Spirit of the Pilgrims, and to the Comprehensive Commentary. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 682.

Wisner, William, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Warwick, N. Y., in 1782. He studied law, and practiced in Orange County; abandoned the law, and became pastor of a Church in Ithaca; was pastor of a Church in Rochester from 1830 to 1862; removed to Cedar Rapids, Ia., in 1870, and died there Jan. 7, 1871. He published, Incidents in the Life of a Pastor (1851):—Elements of Civil Liberty; or, The Way to Maintain Free Institutions (1853):—besides single Sermons, pamphlets, and contributions to periodicals.

Wisner, William Carpenter, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Elmira, N. Y., Dec. 7, 1808. He was prepared for college in the Homer Academy, and graduated at Union College in 1830. He did not pursue any regular theological course at the seminary, but prosecuted his studies under his venerable father, Rev. Dr. Wisner, of Ithaca. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Rochester, and in 1832 was ordained and installed pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church of that city. After remaining there for a short time, he removed to Athens, Pa., where he preached for a while, and then served the Church in East Avon, N. Y., for eighteen months. In 1836 he accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church of St. Louis, Mo. In 1837 he was called to the Church at Lower Lockport, and in 1842 became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Lockport, and resigned on account of failing health after a successful pastorate of thirty-four years. He was for many years a trustee of Hamilton College and Auburn Seminary. He was moderator of the New School General Assembly at St. Louis in 1855. He died at Lockport, N. Y., July 14, 1880. His manner as a public speaker was peculiar, and strangers to it would at first find it unpleasant; but becoming familiar with it, they would come under his power, and find him a teacher of great originality, and would become fascinated with him. His principal publication was a work entitled, Prelacy and Parity. (W. P. S.)

Witch is the rendering, in the A. V., at Exod. xxii, 18, of מְכַשֵּׁפִים (mekashshepháh, Sept. φαρμακοί, Vulg. malefici), and in Deut. xviii, 10, of the masc. form. of the same word (מְכַשֵּׁפָה, mekashshephé, Sept. φαρμακός, Vulg. maleficus), which is elsewhere rendered "sorcerer" (Exod. vii, 11; Dan. ii, 2; Mal. iii, 5).

WITCH OF ENDOR. See SAUL.

Withers, Philip, D.D., an English clergyman, became chaplain to lady dowager Hereford in 1783. He was sentenced Nov. 21, 1789, to a fine of £50 and a year's imprisonment for a libel on Mrs. Fitzherbert, wife to the prince of Wales, in his History of the Royal Malady (Lond. 1789). He died in Newgate, July 24, 1790. He also published a work entitled Aristarchus; or, The Principles of Composition (1791).

Witherspoon, John, D.D., LL.D., a distinguished Presbyterian divine, and one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was born in the parish of Yeater, near Edinburgh, Scotland, Feb. 5, 1722. His father was a clergyman of the Church of Scotland, much respected for his piety and learning; on his mother's side, he traced an unbroken line of ministerial ancestry, through a period of more than two hundred years, to the great Reformer, John Knox. He experienced religion at a very early period; pursued his preparatory studies in the public school at Haddington, where he soon evinced remarkable powers; graduated at the University of Edinburgh, where he stood "unrivalled for perspicuity of style, logical accuracy of thought, taste in sacred criticism, and all those intellectual qualities and accomplishments which, in after-life, conspired to render him one of the great men of the age and of the world;" was licensed to preach in 1743; ordained as minister of the popular parish of Beith, in the west of Scotland, in 1745; and of the Low

Church in Paisley, Jan. 16, 1757; here he continued till the year 1768, when he was elected president of the College of New Jersey, and inaugurated at a meeting of the trustees, called specially for the purpose, Aug. 17, 1768. The fame of his talents and learning had preceded him, and consequently he brought to the college a large accession of students, and was the means of greatly increasing its funds, and placing it on a foundation of permanent usefulness. Indeed, few men could combine more important qualifications for the presidency of a literary institution—"talents, extensive attainments, commanding personal appearance, and an admirable faculty for governing young men, and exciting in them a noble emulation to excel in their studies." He introduced many important improvements in the system of education—particularly the method of teaching by lecture, which seems previously to have been unknown to American colleges; and he actually delivered lectures on four different subjects—viz., Eloquence and Composition, Taste and Criticism; Moral Philosophy; Chronology and History; and Divinity. He likewise rendered most important service to the college by increasing its library and philosophical apparatus, and introducing the study of the Hebrew and French languages; he was also chiefly instrumental in obtaining the first orrery constructed by the celebrated Rittenhouse. In connection with his duties as president, he was pastor of the Church in Princeton during the whole period of his presidency. But he was soon to enter upon a new sphere of duty. He was selected by the citizens of New Jersey, in 1776, as a delegate to the Congress that promulgated the Declaration of Independence. He continued to represent the State of New Jersey in the General Congress from 1776 to 1782, and in practical business talent and devotion to public affairs he was second to none in that body. Many of the most important state-papers of the day were from his pen. During the whole period in which he was occupied in civil life he never laid aside his ministerial character, but wished it understood that he was "a minister of God," in a sacred as well as in a civil sense. When he retired from the national councils, he went to his country-place near Princeton, N. J., having two years before partially given up his duties as president of the college to the vice-president, his son-in-law, Dr. Samuel Stanhope Smith. He died Nov. 15, 1794. Dr. Witherspoon was undoubtedly one of the ablest, as well as one of the most voluminous, writers of his time. He published, Ecclesiastical Characteristics; or, The Arcana of Church Policy (Glasgow, 1758, 8vo; 3d ed. 1754, 8vo; at least five edits.). This work was aimed at certain principles and practices which then prevailed extensively in the Church of Scotland, and by its acknowledged ability, and particularly by the keenness of its satire, it produced a great sensation and acquired immense popularity:—A Serious Apology for the Characteristics, in which he avows himself the author of the preceding work:—Essay on the Connection between the Doctrine of Justification by the Imputed Righteousness of Christ and Holiness of Life, etc. (Edinb. 1756, 12mo; often republished). "This work has always been regarded as one of the ablest Calvinistic expositions of that doctrine in any language. I hope you approve Mr. Witherspoon's books. I think his Treatise on Regeneration is the best I have seen upon this important subject" (Rev. John Newton to Mr. Cunningham, in Bull's Life of Newton [1868, p. 150]):—Serious Inquiry into the Nature and Effects of the Stage (Glasgow, 1757; with Sermon by Samuel Miller, D.D., N. Y. 1812, 12mo). This work had its origin in the fact that Mr. John Home, a clergyman of the Church of Scotland, had published his well-known tragedy of Douglas, which was acted repeatedly in the Edinburgh Theatre, where a number of the author's clerical friends attended. The Rev. John Newton, speaking of this work, says he "wishes every person who makes the least pretence to fear God had an opportunity of perusing" it:—Essays on Important Sub- jects, with Ecclesiastical Characteristics (Lond. 1764, 3 vols. 12mo; 1765, 3 vols. 12mo). These volumes were composed of pieces which had previously been published in Scotland, with the exception of his celebrated Treatise on Regeneration, which appeared now for the first time. This Treatise was also published separately in 1764, 12mo:—Sermons (9) on Practical Subjects (Glasgow, 1768, 12mo; Edinb. 1804, 12mo):—Practical Discourses (14) on Leading Truths of the Gospel (1768, 12mo; Lond. 1792, 8vo; 1804, 12mo). The discourses in this volume are so arranged as to form a concise system of practical divinity:—Considerations on the Nature and Extent of the Legislative Authority of the British Parliament (Phila. 1774, 8vo; Lond. 1775, 8vo). He also published a number of Sermons:—Lectures on moral philosophy, on eloquence, on divinity, and on education:—Letters on Marriage:—an excellent Essay on Money:—philological papers (see The Druid):—various Speeches in Congress, etc. After his death appeared, in one volume, Sermons on Various Subjects, a Supplementary Volume, with the Hist. of a Corporation of Servants, and other Tracts (Edinb. 1798, 12mo; 1799, 12mo). A collective edition of his works, with an account of the author's life, with Sermon by John Rodgers, D.D. (also published separately [N. Y. 1795, 8vo], and in Prot. Dissent. Magazine, vol. ii), was published in New York (1800–1, 4 vols. 8vo; 2d ed. 1802, 4 vols. 8vo), Samuel Stanhope Smith, D.D., supplying the Memoir. Another edition, with his Life, appeared at Edinburgh in 1804 (9 vols. 12mo); again in 1815 (9 vols. 12mo). His Miscellaneous Works were published at Philadelphia (1803, 8vo); his Select Works, with Life, in London (1804, 2 vols. 8vo); his Lectures on Moral Philosophy in Philadelphia (3d ed. 1810, 12mo); his Essays, Lectures, etc. in Edinburgh (1822, 4 vols. 12mo); and Sermons on Public Occasions (2 vols. 12mo). "The name of Dr. Witherspoon stands high on both continents. No man thinks of Witherspoon as a Briton, but as an American of the Americans: as the counsellor of Morris, the correspondent of Washington, the rival of Franklin in his sagacity, and of Reed in his resolution; one of the boldest in that Declaration of Independence, and one of the most revered in the debates of the Congress" (Alexander [Rev. J. W.], Princeton Address). See Chambers and Thomson, Biog. Dict. of Eminent Scots (ed. 1855), iv, 487; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 288–300; Rich, *Bibl. Amer. Witsius (Wits, or Witsen), HERMAN, a Dutch theologian of the Federal school, with mediating tendencies, was born at Enkhuysen, in West Frisia, Feb. 12, 1636. His father was a magistrate, and later burgomaster of the town; and his uncle, Peter Gerhard, was a scholar, from whom he doubtless received the exact classical training and the liberal tendencies which distinguished him among the men of his time. He entered the University of Groningen when sixteen years of age, and subsequently studied also at Leyden and Utrecht. The teachers whose influence over him was most pronounced were Leusden, who initiated him into the study of the Old-Test. Scriptures and the Oriental languages with such success that at the age of eighteen years he was able to deliver a learned address in Hebrew; Cocceius; and Justus van den Bogaerd, a preacher, who made him acquainted with subjective Christianity, and of whom he was accustomed to say that the best of all his theological acquirements had been obtained at his hands.

Witsius passed the examination pro ministerio with honor in 1656, and became pastor at Westwoud. In 1661 he was at Wormeren, in 1666 at Goesen, and in 1668 at Leedwarden. In these several fields of labor he earned the reputation of a faithful pastor, a superior preacher, and a scholarly thinker, and was, in consequence, honored in 1675 with a call to a professorship and pulpit at Franeker, and after five years more with a similar call to Utrecht. In 1685 he was appointed chaplain to the embassy sent by the Netherlands to the court of James II of England, and while in England he entered into relations of personal intimacy with prince William (subsequently king William III.). In 1698 he accepted a call to Leyden, which released him from the pulpit, and on Oct. 22, 1708, he closed his busy life in death.

The principal work of Witsius (De Economica Fœderum Dei cum Hominibus Libri IV) was published in 1677, and originated in his desire to meliorate the acrimonious spirit apparent in the controversies between the orthodox and the Federalists. His plan involved no true mediation between the opposing systems, however, but merely the knocking-off of a few of the more prominent angles on the Federal hypothesis; and he succeeded only in raising a storm among the Federalists against himself, without conciliating the opposing party. He was simply and only a scriptural theologian, and incapable of exercising the acuteness of a scholastic apprehension—the more, perhaps, because he thought and wrote in classical Latin. The plan of the Econ. Fœd. is confused (lib. i, De Fœd. Dei in Genere; ii, De Fœd. Gratia; iii, De Fœd. cum Electis; iv, De Doctr. Salutis). The doctrine of Christ's person and work is treated of in the second book, and that of the election of grace and the appropriation of salvation in the third. The fourth book contains a history of Revelation, besides the doctrine of the sacraments. The personality of Witsius was of greater importance to the Church than his theology.

Other works of Witsius are, in Latin, Judeus Christianizans:—Exercit. in Symb. Apost. et Orat. Dominicam:—Ægyptiaca (Miscellanea Sacra, Meletemata Leidensia):—Prælia Christianismi cum Imaginibus Spirituualibus:—and minor productions. In Dutch, Lis Domini cum Vineæ suæ, etc. It is to be added that he was well acquainted with modern languages also, especially French, in which he frequently preached without difficulty.

See Heringa, Specimen Hist.-theol. de Herm. Witsio (Amstel. 1861); Gass, Gesch. d. prot. Dogmatik, ii, 318. —Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

Wizard (יִדְדֹנִי, yidd'oni, a knowing one), a term applied both to the sorcerer (Lev. xix, 31; xx, 6; Deut. xviii, 11; 1 Sam. xxviii, 3, 9) and the spirit by which he conjures (Lev. xx, 27). See MAGIC.

The word means literally a person pretending to be wise, but the term is usually employed as the masculine corresponding to witch. In the history of witchcraft, the accusations against men as compared with those against women were as one to one hundred. See DIVINATION.

Wolde, CHARLES GODFREY, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S., a Socinian minister, was born in Poland in 1725. He was educated at Frankfort-on-the-Oder and at Leyden; was for some time pastor at Liassa; settled in England as preacher at the German Chapel Royal, St. James's, in 1770; was subsequently reader and chaplain at the Savoy; and became assistant librarian in the British Museum in 1782, from which time he studied the less-known Oriental languages. He died in London, May 7, 1790. He edited La Croze's Coptic Lexicon (1775), and Scholtz's Egyptian Grammar (1778). He also transcribed with his own hand the New-Test. portion of the Codex Alexandrinus (1786), which he afterwards published in fac-simile. At the time of his death he was engaged in preparing Fragmenta Novi Testamenti a Vers. Ægyptiaca Dialecti, etc., which was completed by Dr. Ford and published at Oxford in 1799.

Wolf (the invariable rendering in the A. V. of זֶבֶב, zeëb, so called either from its fierceness or its yellow color, or perhaps the word is primitive; λύκος), a fierce carnivorous animal, very nearly allied to the dog, and so well known as to require no particular description, excepting as regards the identity of the species in Palestine, which, although often asserted, is by no means established; for no professed zoologist has obtained the animal in Syria, while other travellers only pretend to have seen it. Unquestionably a true wolf, or a wild canine with very similar manners, was not infrequent in that country during the earlier ages of the world, and even down to the commencement of our æra. At this day the true wolf is still abundant in Asia Minor, as well as in the gorges of Cilicia, and, from the travelling disposition of the species, wolves may be expected to reside in the forests of Libanus. Hemprich and Ehrenberg, the most explicit of the naturalists who have visited that region, notice the dib, or zëb, under the denomination of Canis lupaster, and also, it seems, of Lupus Syriacus. They describe it as resembling the wolf, but smaller, with a white tip on the tail, etc.; and give for its synonym Canis anthus and the wolf of Egypt, that is, the λύκος of Aristotle and Thoes anthus of Ham. Smith. This species, found in the mummy state at Lycopolis, though high in proportion to its bulk, measures only eighteen inches at the shoulder, and in weight is scarcely more than one third of that of a true wolf, whose stature rises to thirty and thirty-two inches. It is not gregarious, does not howl, cannot carry off a lamb or sheep, nor kill men, nor make the shepherd flee; in short, it is not the true wolf of Europe or Asia Minor, and is not possessed of the qualities ascribed to the species in the Bible. The next in Hemprich and Ehrenberg's description bears the same Arabic name; it is scientifically called Canis sacer, and is the piseonch of the Copts. This species is, however, still smaller, and thus cannot be the wolf in question. It may be, as there are no forests to the south of Libanus, that these ravenous beasts, who never willingly range at a distance from cover, have forsaken the more open country, or else that the derbonn, now only indistinctly known as a species of black wolf in Arabia and Southern Syria, is the species or variety which anciently represented the wolf in Syria—an appellation fully deserved if it be the same as the black species of the Pyrenees, which, though surmised to be a wild dog, is even more fierce than the common wolf, and is equally powerful. The Arabs are said to eat the derbonn as game, though it must be rare, since no European traveller has described a specimen from personal observation. Therefore, either the true wolf or the derbonn was anciently more abundant in Palestine, or the ravenous powers of those animals, equally belonging to the hyena and to a great wild dog, caused several species to be included in the name. See DOG. "There is also an animal of which travellers in Arabia and Syria hear much, under the name of the shib, which the natives believe to be a breed between a leopard and a wolf. They describe it as being scarcely in its shape distinguishable from the wolf, but with the power of springing like a leopard, and attacking cattle. Its bite is said to be mortal, and to occasion raving madness before death.

In 1772 Dr. Freer saw and measured the forepart and tail of one of these animals, and supplied Dr. Russell with the description which he has inserted in his book. The animal was one of several that followed the Basrah caravan from Basrah to the neighborhood of Aleppo. Many persons in the caravan had been bitten, some of whom died in a short time raving mad. It was also reported that some persons in the neighborhood of Aleppo were bitten, and died in like manner; but the doctor saw none of them himself. Dr. Russell imagines that the shib might be a wolf run mad. But this is a hazardous assumption, as it is doubtful whether canine madness exists in Western Asia; and unless we conclude with Col. Hamilton Smith that the shib is probably the same as the Thous acmon, or the wild wolf-dog of Natolia, it is best to await further information on the subject. Burckhardt says that little doubt can be entertained of the existence of the animal, and explains its fabulous origin (between a wolf and leopard) by stating that the Arabs, and especially the Bedawin, are in the common practice of assigning to every animal that is rarely met with parents of two different species of known animals" (Kitto, Phys. Hist. of Palest. ii, 364).

The following are the scriptural allusions to the wolf: Its ferocity is mentioned in Gen. xlix, 27; Ezek. xxii, 27; Hab. i, 8; Matt. vii, 15; its nocturnal habits in Jer. v, 6; Zeph. iii, 3; Hab. i, 8; its attacking sheep and lambs in Eccles. xiii, 17; John x, 12; Matt. x, 16; Luke x, 3. Isaiah (xi, 6; lxx, 25) foretells the peaceful reign of the Messiah under the metaphor of a wolf dwelling with a lamb. Cruel persecutors are compared with wolves (Matt. x, 16; Acts xx, 29). See ZEKIAH.

Wolves were doubtless far more common in Biblical times than they are now, though they are occasionally reported by modern travellers (see Russell, Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, ii, 184): "The wolf seldom ventures so near the city as the fox, but is sometimes seen at a distance by the sportsmen among the hilly grounds in the neighborhood; and the villages, as well as the herds, often suffer from them. It is called dib in Arabic, and is common all over Syria." The wolf is now, as of old, the dread of the shepherds of Palestine. Not so numerous, but much more formidable than the jackal, he lurks about the fields, hunting not in noisy packs, but secreting himself till dark among the rocks; and without arousing the vigilance of the sheep-dogs, he leaps into the fold, and seizes his victim by stealth. Their boldness at times, however, is very remarkable, especially in the less-frequented regions. "In every part of the country we occasionally saw the wolf. In the open plain of Gennesaret my horse one day literally leaped over a wolf. In the hill country of Benjamin the wolves still remain. We found them alike in the forests of Bashan and Gilead, in the ravines of Galilee and Lebanon, and in the maritime plains" (Tristram, Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 154).

Wolves, like many other animals, are subject to variation in color. The common color is gray with a tinting of fawn and long black hairs. The variety most frequent in Southern Europe and the Pyrenees is black; the wolf of Asia Minor is more tawny than those of the common color. The Syrian wolf likewise is of a lighter color than the wolf of Europe, being a pale fawn tint, and seems to be a larger and stronger animal. See FOX.

WOLF, JOHANN CHRISTOPH, well known by his works in the field of Jewish literature, was born at Wernigerode, Germany, Feb. 21, 1683. At the gymnasium of his native place he received a solid classical education. In 1695 he went to Hamburg with his father, and here he prosecuted his preparatory studies under Anckelmann, Edzard, and Fabricius. In 1703 we find Wolf at Wittenberg; in 1704 he was made a doctor, and in 1706 he was received into the academic senate; in 1707 he returned to Hamburg, and was appointed co-rector at Flensburg; in 1708 he went to Holland and England, and was thus brought in contact with the learned men of his age, as Vitringa, Hemsterhuys, Clericus, Surenhusius, Reland, Perizonius, Basnage, Bentley, Barnes, Cave, and others. At Oxford he stayed about six months, and spent most of his time in the Bodleian Library. In 1709 he returned to Flensburg, where he received a call to Wittenberg as professor of philosophy; in 1712 he was appointed professor of Oriental languages at the Hamburg Gymnasium, and in 1716 he became pastor of St. Catharine's. He died July 25, 1739. His main work is his Bibliotheca Hebræa (Hamburg, 1715-33, 4 vols.); the first vol. contains a list of Jewish authors; the second treats of the Old Test., its MSS., editions, etc.; the third and fourth are supplements to the first two. This Bibliotheca is still the great storehouse of information on Jewish literature; and although Jewish writers of our day speak of its deficiencies and shortcomings (but how could it be otherwise?), yet these fault-finders, while abusing the author, copy his work. Those, however, who have labored in the same department will always speak with great admiration of Wolf's Bibliotheca. Steinschneider says of our author "dass Wolf an Fleiss, Ehrlichkeit, Besonnenheit, und Unbefangenheit zugleich noch von keinem christlichen und von sehr wenigen jüdischen Autoren auf diesem Gebiete übertroffen worden" (Bibliog. Handbuch, p. xviii). Besides his great work, he wrote, דברי ספרי (1711), Historia Lexicorum Hebraicorum (Wittenberg, 1705);—De Usu Talmudicæ Rabbini-cæque Lectionis Elenchico (ibid. 1706);—Notitia Karae-orum (Hamburg, 1721). Wolfenbüttel Fragments. See LESSING.

Wolfenbüttel Manuscript (CODEX GUELPHER-

Specimen of the Codex Guelpherytanus A (containing Luke i, 6, 7).

BYTANUS) is the name given to two palimpsest fragments (A and B) of the Greek Testament (usually designated as P and Q of the Gospels), which were discovered by Knittel in the ducal library at Wolfenbüttel, Brunswick, under the more modern writings of Isidore of Seville. He published the whole in 1762, and Tischendorf more accurately in vol. iii of his Monumenta Sacra Inedita (1860). The volume of which they are a part (called the Codex Carolinus) seems to have been once at Bobbio, and has been traced from Mayence and Prague, till it was bought by a duke of Brunswick in 1689. Codex P contains, on 43 leaves, 31 fragments of 486 verses from all four evangelists; Codex Q, on 13 leaves, 12 fragments of 235 verses from Luke and John. A few portions, once written in vermilion, have quite departed. They belong to the 6th or 6th century. Both are written in two columns, the uncials being bold, those of Q considerably smaller. The capitals in P are large and frequent, and both have the Ammonian sections without the canons of Eusebius. See Scrivener, Introd. p. 113; Tregelles, in Home's Introd. iv, 179. See MANUSCRIPTS.

Wolff, Bernard C., D.D., a German Reformed minister, was born at Martinsburg, W. Va., Dec. 11, 1794. When a mere child he received the impression that he ought to be a minister, and this conviction deepened with his subsequent development. He was sent to the best schools afforded by his native place, where he made rapid progress, especially in mathematics; and subsequently received instruction under private tutors in the family of B. M. Coulston, Esq., who lived near Martinsburg. He also pursued the study of the Latin and Greek languages for some time under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Denny, a Presbyterian clergyman of Chambersburg, Pa., with whom he made attainments which would have admitted him to the junior class in college. He was then called home by his father to engage with him in the saddle and harness making business, where he labored four or five years, until, at the age of twenty-one, he became the sole owner of the shop. In his thirty-seventh year he entered the Theological Seminary at York, Pa., completed his course in 1832, and was licensed at Frederick, Md., in September of the same year. He became associate pastor of the Church at Easton, Pa., in 1832; pastor of the Third Church in Baltimore, Md., in 1844; entered upon the duties of the office of professor of didactic and practical theology in the Theological Seminary at Mercersburg, Pa., Nov. 29, 1854; resigned his professorship some years previous to his death, and devoted the remainder of his days to the interests of the educational institutions of his Church. He died at Lancaster, Pa., Nov. 1, 1870. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 246.

Wolff, Joseph, D.D., LL.D., not inappropriately called a meteor or comet on the missionary heaven, was born of Jewish parentage, in 1795, in Bavaria. Endowed with almost unprecedented linguistic talent, a quick power of perception, lively temperament, and great prudence, he became acquainted at a very early age with the most prominent men in different countries of Europe. In 1812 he was baptized at Prague by a Benedictine monk. While at Vienna he was introduced to the highest ecclesiastical dignitaries; lived for some time with count Stolberg in his castle of Tatenhausen, and went to Rome to be educated there as a missionary. His heart was filled with the desire to proclaim the glad tidings of the Gospel to both Jews and Mohammedans. Although he enjoyed the favor of the most prominent men in Rome, especially that of pope Pius VII., and formed acquaintances which were of the greatest interest in his life, yet he could not reconcile himself to Romanism. While at Rome he spent his time in studying Oriental languages. Some liberal views which he had expressed on sundry occasions made him suspected in the eyes of the Inquisition, and he had to leave the college and the Eternal City. After many adventures, he went to London, and here he joined the Church of England. Soon he became acquainted with men like Henry Drummond, Charles Simeon, Lewis Way—the founders of the London Society for the Jews. They, perceiving Wolff's special fitness for missionary work, effected his entrance to Cambridge University, where he continued his Oriental studies under Prof. Lee. After two years (in 1821) he gave up his studies, and commenced his adventurous life as a traveller. Amid the richest and most remarkable experiences, he travelled over Europe, Asia, America, and a part of Africa. In these journeys he became acquainted with kings and princes, as well as with the most learned men of all ecclesiastical relations; everywhere professing Jesus as the Christ; and although he had often been imprisoned and his life had been endangered several times, yet in the greatest perils he showed an undaunted courage and great presence of mind. Mesopotamia, Persia, Egypt, Bokhara, witnessed his ardent zeal. He preached everywhere—at one time in this language, at another time in a different one; distributed the Holy Scriptures in the various languages of the East; and wherever he went he understood how to interest the most prominent men and women in his behalf. In 1837 Wolff arrived in America, to be ordained by bishop Doane of New Jersey. After spending some time in this country, he left New York Jan. 2, 1838, for England. Here he at first occupied a small incumbency at Linthwaite, in Yorkshire; but as the climate was too cold for the health of his wife (lady Georgiana Walpole, daughter of the count of Oxford), Wolff exchanged that pastoral charge for the curacy of High Hoyland, in the county of York, and there he remained for nearly five years. At the beginning of the year 1843, Wolff heard of the imprisonment of colonel Stoddart and captain Conolly in Bokhara, and this induced him to proceed to that place in order to ascertain their whereabouts. From what he learned on this his most dangerous journey, he was convinced that Stoddart and Conolly were dead. In 1844 he returned to England and received the parish in Ile Brewers. Here he labored for the remainder of his life, and died May 2, 1862. Before his death he fulfilled the promise made by him many years before to the Armenian and Greek patriarchs of helping them to establish hostels in Cambridge and Oxford: the Rev. George Williams, senior fellow of King's College, Cambridge, assisted and co-operated with him in this undertaking. Wolff published, Researches and Missionary Labors among the Jews, etc. (Lond. 1835):—Missionary Journal and Memoir, written by himself (revised and edited by J. Bagford, ibid. 1824):—Missionary Journal, vol. iii (ibid. 1829):—Journal giving an Account of his Missionary Labors from the Year 1827 to 1831, and from 1835 to 1838 (ibid. 1839):—Narrative of a Mission to Bokhara in the Years 1843–45 (2 ed. ibid. 1845, 2 vols.):—but the most interesting are his Travels and Adventures of the Rev. Joseph Wolff (ibid. 1861). The latter forms the basis of Dr. H. Sengelmann's Dr. Joseph Wolff: ein Wanderleben (Hamburg, 1863). (B. P.)

Wolfgang, St., and bishop of Ratibon in the 10th century, belonged to a noble family of Alemanni, and was a pupil of the Convent of Reichenau, which, in the early half of that century, possessed the best school among the convents of Germany, and of Würzburg, where he had the misfortune to explain a passage in Martian Capella (De Nuptiis Philologiae et Mercurii) more thoroughly than his teacher, a learned Italian named Stephen, was able to do, and to be refused further instruction in consequence. In 956 he accompanied archbishop Henry of Treves to his diocese, and became a teacher of youth and dean of the clergy. On the death of the archbishop in 964, Wolfgang retired to the monastery of Einsiedeln, and became an example of faithful asceticism to his brother monks. Bishop Ulric of Augsburg ordained him to the priesthood, and he thereupon resolved to engage in missionary labors. He travelled through Alemannia and Noricum to Pannonia;

but, meeting with less success than he had expected, he accepted a call to visit bishop Pilgrim of Passau, and was soon afterwards, through that prelate's influence, chosen bishop of Ratisbon, and invested with the staff. He was consecrated and enthroned in St. Peter's Church by archbishop Frederick of Salzburg and his suffragans in 973. Soon afterwards he persuaded his chapter to accede to the wish of the Bohemians for a separation of their country from the diocese of Ratisbon, and its erection into an independent see; and he also supplied the Monastery of St. Emmerau, over which the bishops of Ratisbon had always presided, with a regular abbot, and set apart a portion of the cathedral possessions for the support of the monks. He furthermore reformed the nunneries of Upper and Lower Mûnster at Ratisbon, whose occupants, being generally of noble family, argued that they, as canonesses rather than regular nuns, were not required to practice so strict an asceticism as nuns; the end being accomplished through the zeal of the nuns of the new convent of Middle Mûnster which he founded. He was equally zealous and judicious in his care over the material and spiritual interests of his secular clergy and over the moral and physical needs of the common people. He was immovably loyal to the emperor, so that duke Henry II of Bavaria was unable to persuade him to become a supporter of the rebellion against Otho II; and when Henry submitted, Wolfgang built as a thank-offering the crypt at St. Emmerau. He accompanied the emperor's suite in the campaign of 978. On the return the army was pursued by the French, and, on reaching a swollen river, was in danger of being cut to pieces because the soldiers feared to attempt the crossing. Wolfgang thereupon plunged into the stream, and the army, emboldened by his example, escaped without the loss of a man. His influence led to a better cultivation of the East Marches of Bavaria. He built the Castle of Wieselberg as a defence against the inroads of the Hungarians. He also educated the children of duke Henry, the oldest of whom became at a later day the emperor of Germany. After administering the episcopal office during twenty-one years, he died at Puppington, Oct. 31, 994, and was buried in a chapel of St. Emmerau's. See Othlo, Vita Wolfgangi, in Pertz, *Monum. Wollaston, FRANCIS, LL.D., an English clergyman, a grandson of William Wollaston, was born in 1731; became rector of Chiselhurst, in Kent, and died in 1815. He published, Address to the Clergy, etc. (1772):—Queries relating to the Book of Common Prayer (1774):—and several astronomical works.

Wolsey, THOMAS, a celebrated English cardinal and statesman, was born at Ipswich, in March, 1471. He is said to have been the son of a butcher named Robert Wolsey, and his wife Joan, who were poor but reputable, and possessed sufficient means to give their son the best education his native town afforded, and then to send him to Magdalen College, Oxford, where he graduated at the age of fifteen, and gained by his early advancement the sobriquet of "the boy-bachelor." He was soon after chosen a fellow of his college, and on taking his master's degree was appointed teacher of Magdalen grammar-school, and was ordained. In 1498 he was made bursar of the college, and has the credit of building Magdalen Tower about this time. While at Oxford he became acquainted with Erasmus (q. v.), and united his efforts with those of that eminent scholar for the promotion of letters. But in subsequent years, as Wolsey began to advance in position and preferment, while Erasmus continued to live the life of a mere scholar, the intimacy which existed between them began to diminish into a mere courteous formality, which circumstance drew from Erasmus the opinion, when Wolsey fell, that he was not worthy of the honor which he had received. While teaching at Magdalen College Wolsey acted as tutor to the three sons of the marquis of Dorset. By this means an acquaintance sprang up between Wolsey and the marquis which resulted in giving the former his first ecclesiastical preferment—viz. the rectory of Lymington, in Somersetshire, conferred on him in 1500. While here he fell into disgrace. Being at a fair in the neighborhood, he was engaged in some kind of disorderly conduct (possibly drunk, as has been charged), and was arrested by one Sir Amias Poulet, a justice of the peace, and put in the stocks. The indignity was remembered by Wolsey, and when he became chancellor, Sir Amias was imprisoned for six years by his order. He next became domestic chaplain to Henry Dean, archbishop of Canterbury, and on his death, in 1503, was appointed chaplain to Sir John Nafant, through whose influence he became chaplain to King Henry VII. In 1504 he received the rectory of Redgrave, in Norfolk, which constituted his third living. His influence and favor at court were rapidly increasing, and in February, 1508, the king gave him the deanery of Lincoln and two prebends in the same church.

The death of the king in the following year brought to the throne a sovereign of a very different character from the one who had just left it. Great changes were to be made at court by Henry VIII; but amid them all Wolsey managed to be not only retained, but promoted still further. Many circumstances favored his promotion. He was in the prime of life; he was accustomed to the court for which his manners and address peculiarly fitted him; and he also held an important place in the Church. Added to this, there were animosities between the Earl of Surrey, the lord-treasurer, and Fox, the bishop of Winchester, who was also keeper of the privy seal and secretary of state. Fox, desiring to strengthen his own influence by placing one of his friends and adherents near the king, made Wolsey the king's almoner. The adroit courtier rose so rapidly in the king's estimation that he did almost as he pleased. He studied to please the young king by joining in indulgences which, however suitable to the gayety of a court, were ill becoming the character of an ecclesiastic. Yet amid the luxuries which he promoted in his royal master, he did not neglect to inculcate maxims of state, and present to him the advantages of a system of favoritism which he secretly hoped would one day result in his own advancement. Before the year of the king's accession had closed, he had become lord almoner, and had been presented with valuable lands and houses in London. In 1510 he became rector of Torrington; in 1511, canon of Windsor and registrar of the Order of the Garter; in 1512, prebendary of York; in 1513, dean of York and bishop of Tournay, in France; in 1514, bishop of Lincoln, and in the same year archbishop of York. In 1515 he was made a cardinal, and succeeded Warham as chancellor. In 1516 the pope made him legate a latere, a commission which gave him great wealth and almost unlimited power over the English clergy. He also farmed the revenues of certain dioceses which were held by foreign bishops, appropriating a good share to his own use, and received stipends from the kings of France and Spain and the doge of Venice. Thus Wolsey had secured to himself the whole power of the state, both civil and ecclesiastical, and derived from various sources an amount of revenue hitherto unknown to any but the royalty. Yet his ambition was not satisfied. He aspired to the papacy, and had a considerable following in 1522 as candidate for the place left vacant by Leo X, and again in 1523 for that of Adrian VI.

Wolsey was fond of display, and indulged that fondness to a degree never before approached by a subject. At York Place (now Whitehall) his residence was furnished with every luxury; and at Hampton Court he built for himself a palace which he eventually presented to the king. His dress was gorgeous, his manner of living sumptuous, and his household consisted of more than five hundred persons, among whom were many people of rank—lords, earls, and the like. Yet while his train of servants consisted of these persons, his house was a school where their sons were educated and initiated into public life. While he was dazzling the eyes or insulting the feelings of people by an ostentation of gorgeous furniture and equipage, he was a general and liberal patron of literature and art. He promoted learning with a munificent hand. He established lectureships, professorships, and colleges at his own expense. He was the founder of a college, or school, at Ipswich which, for a time, rivalled the schools of Eton and Winchester, but was discontinued at the cardinal's fall. He also founded Cardinal's College at Oxford, which remains to-day as Christ Church.

He was an opponent of the Lutheran Reformation, and manifested his zeal against it in 1521, by procuring the condemnation of Luther's doctrines in an assembly of divines held at his own house. He also published the pope's bull against Luther, and endeavored to suppress his writings in England. But he was always lenient towards English Lutherans, and one article of his impeachment was that he was remiss in punishing heretics. His ecclesiastical administration was exceedingly corrupt, furnishing to all clergymen an example of holding many preferments without performing the duties of any of them. The effect of this was to sow in England many of the seeds of the Reformation which followed. In 1528 he resigned the see of Durham for that of Winchester; but to the latter place he never went. About this time was the beginning of difficulties, the end of which he might have foreseen, but had no power to avert. Henry VIII desired to employ the cardinal's talents in aid of his proposed divorce from queen Catherine and marriage with Anne Boleyn. But his tardy efforts and rigid adherence to legal forms and technicalities greatly exasperated the king, who was not to be trifled with even in the gratification of his baser passions. Unfortunately, too, for Wolsey, his conduct had been such as to inspire the hatred of both the queen and her rival. Catherine knew that he had taken steps towards procuring her divorce, and Anne Boleyn knew that he was using his influence against her marriage with the king. Added to this enmity in high place were the jealousy and opposition of the numerous aspirants for preferment who had been less successful than himself. With such a combination against him, his fall was speedily and relentlessly accomplished.

On the first day of the term, Oct. 9, 1529, while he was opening the court of chancery at Westminster, the attorney-general indicted him in the court of King's Bench for procuring a bull from Rome appointing him legate, contrary to the statute, by which he had incurred a præmunire, and forfeited all his goods to the king and might be imprisoned. The king immediately sent and demanded the great seal from him, and ordered him to leave his magnificent palace at York Place. Before leaving this place he made an inventory of the furniture, plate, and other works of art, which he had added, and it is said to have amounted to the immense sum of five hundred thousand crowns. From thence he started to Esher, near Hampton Court, and was met on the way, as he was riding from Putney on his mule, by a messenger who assured him that he still retained his place in the royal favor, and presented him with a ring which the king employed as a token to give credit to the bearer. The message was received by Wolsey with the humblest expressions of gratitude; but he seems not to have credited the mockery, as he proceeded on his way to Esher. Wolsey might have produced in his own defence against the indictment the king's letters-patent authorizing him to accept the pope's bull; but he merely instructed his attorney to plead, in his absence, his entire ignorance of the statute, and that he acknowledged other particulars with which he was charged, and submitted himself to the king's mercy. The court, however, passed the sentence that he was "out of the protection, and his lands, goods, and chattels forfeit, and his person might be seized." His enemies continued their prosecutions. Forty-four articles were presented against him to the House of Lords, which were to serve as the basis of his utter ruin. But he had already suffered almost as much punishment as it was possible to inflict upon him, and Parliament could do little more than sanction what had already been done. Wolsey also found a friend in Thomas Cromwell, formerly his steward, subsequently earl of Essex, who defended him with such spirit and eloquence as materially to change the tide of his fortunes. His speech had the effect to cause the Commons to reject the articles, and this brought the proceedings of the lords to a standstill. During his residence at Esher, the cardinal's health was found to be declining rapidly, and the king was induced, from the impression that it was mental rather than physical trouble that was preying upon his vitality, to show him such kindness as revived his spirits at once. Henry also granted him, Feb. 12, 1530, a free pardon for all crimes and misdemeanors, a few days afterwards restored to him a large part of his revenues, and allowed him to remove from Esher to Richmond. From thence he was removed to the archbishop's seat at Southwell; and then his residence was fixed at Cawood Castle, which he began to repair, and was beginning to gain favor with the people when the king had him arrested for high-treason, and ordered him to be brought to London. He set out on Nov. 1, 1530, but on the road he was seized with a disorder which ended his life at Leicester Abbey on the 28th of the month. During his last hours he gave utterance to the expression, "If I had served my God as diligently as I have served my king, he would not have given me over to my enemies."

"Wolsey attained his elevation by a winning address, combined with shrewdness, talent, and learning. His ambition was unlimited, his rapacity great; he was arrogant and overbearing, and extremely fond of splendor and parade. But he was a great minister, enlightened beyond the age in which he lived, diligent in business, and a good servant to the king; for when his authority was established, he checked the king's cruelty, restrained many of his caprices, and kept his passion within bounds. The latter part of Henry's reign was very far more criminal than that during which the cardinal presided over his counsels." See HENRY VIII.

Womb (usually  $\text{בֶּטֶן}$ , gastrón, both meaning belly, as often rendered; but the distinctive term is  $\text{חֲמִצָּה}$ ). The fruit of the womb is children (Gen. xxx, 2), and the Psalmist describes them as the blessing of marriage (Psa. cxvii, 3-5). See CHILD.

Wood (usually  $\text{עֵץ}$ , also rendered "tree;"  $\text{ξύλον}$ ). The East, especially Egypt (Hasselquist, p. 70; Norden, p. 361), is remarkably destitute of forests, and Palestine is nearly as barren of them, except in some of the northern and eastern districts. See TREE. Consequently the inhabitants are obliged to use, instead of fire-wood, dried grass (Matt. vi, 30; Luke xii, 28), or plants, leaves, straw (Matt. iii, 12; Mishna, Shabb, iii, 1), and, in the absence of these, dung (Ezek. iv, 12, 15; see Prokesch, Erinner. ii, 248), and in Babylon mineral pitch (Diod. Sic. ii, 12). Comp. Korte, Reis. p. 577; Tavernier, i, 280; Arriæux, i, 152; Robinson, i, 342; iii, 293; Wellsted, ii, 60. See FUEL.

An unusual supply was required for the sacrificial fire. See BURNT-OFFERING. Charcoal was also used. See COAL. That the advantage of forests was a common property does not follow from Lam. iv, 4, and is of itself very improbable in a land where a strict system of proprietorship was in vogue. For the various fabrics of this material, see HANDICRAFT. The chief trades concerned were carpenters (Exod. xxxv, 30 sq.), cabinet-makers (xxv, 10 sq.; xxxvii, 1, 10, 15, 25, etc.), wheelwrights (Judg. iv, 13; 1 Sam. vi, 7; 1 Kings vii, 33; ix, 19; Hos. x, 11, etc.), basket-weavers (Numb. vi, 15 sq.; Deut. xxvi, 2, 4; Judg. vi, 19), and (unlawfully) image-carvers. See IDOL. On the other hand, we find no trace of cooperage (not even in Jer. xlviii, 12, where פְּלִים denotes not casks, but vessels generally). Anciently, as still, the Orientals used leather bottles, horns, and jars, instead of barrels; but pails (wooden buckets) were probably unknown (Lev. xv, 12?). The tools of wood-workers were the axe or hatchet (קַרְדֵּם or פִּיִּין), the saw (מִשּׁוֹר), the plane (מִקְצוֹצָה?), and the auger (Talm. טַקְרָה, Mishna, Chel. xiii, 4). See, generally, Belerman, Handb. i, 232 sq. As ships were not built by the Hebrews, and stone was the ready material for building, architecture had little use for wood. See HOUSE.

Wood, James (1), D.D., an eminent Presbyterian divine, was born at Greenfield, N. Y., July 12, 1799. He graduated at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in 1822; studied theology in the Seminary at Princeton, N. J.; was licensed by Albany Presbytery, and ordained and installed in 1826 as pastor of the Church at Amsterdam, N. Y., and retained this connection until 1833, when he became agent for the Presbyterian Board of Education, laboring in the states of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama with marked success; became professor of Biblical literature in the Theological Seminary at New Albany, Ind., in 1839; associate secretary of the Board of Education in 1854; president of Hanover College, Hanover, Ind., from 1859 to 1866; president of Van Rensselaer Institute, Hightstown, N. J., from 1866 until his death, April 7, 1867. Dr. Wood was a man of mark in his day, and occupied many prominent places of usefulness. In the controversies which resulted in the division of the Presbyterian Church, he was a very able and successful writer. His work entitled Old and New Theology is the most comprehensive, and the fullest exhibition of the reasons which led to the disruption that has ever been published. Its temper, tact, and conclusiveness are admirable. Dr. Hodge, late professor in the Theological Seminary, Princeton, N. J., wrote as follows: "In common with all his brethren, I ever regarded him as one of our best, wisest, and most useful ministers. The important positions which he was called upon to fill are proofs of the high estimation in which he was held. His sound judgment, dignified manners, amiable temper, combined with his learning and energy, secured for him a wide and happy influence in the Church." Dr. Wood was the author of a Treatise on Baptism (1850, 12mo):—Call to the Sacred Office:—The Best Lesson and Best Time:—The Gospel Fountain (18mo):—Old and New Theology (1855, 12mo):—Grace and Glory (1860, 18mo). He published also four educational pamphlets, and contributed a Memoir of the Author to Rev. James Matthews's Influence of the Bible, etc. (Phila.). See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 154; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (J. L. S.)

Wood, James (2), D.D., an English clergyman, was born about 1760; educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; became dean of Ely in 1820; and died at Cambridge in April, 1839. He was co-author of a valuable series of mathematical works known as the Cambridge Course of Mathematics.

Wood, Jeremiah, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Greenfield, Saratoga Co., N. Y., Nov. 11, 1801.

After graduation at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in 1824, he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, and remained there over two years, but without completing the course. He was licensed by the Albany Presbytery in August, 1826, and began preaching at Mayfield, N. Y., within the bounds of the presbytery, in November of that year. He was ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of Albany, Jan. 10, 1828, and continued his work as a stated supply at Mayfield until Sept. 2, 1840, and after twelve years was installed as pastor. He continued in this field through a period of nearly half a century. Dr. Wood was a man of clear intellect, and possessed unusual power as a debater and pulpit orator. He was a wise counsellor, and his opinions always commanded respect among his brethren. His deep piety, consistent life, and faithful labors made him an uncommonly successful pastor, and he was deeply beloved by his people. During his long ministry he was permitted to witness many powerful and glorious revivals among the people of his charge. In one of these in 1873 the membership of his Church was almost doubled. He died suddenly, June 6, 1876. (W. P. S.)

Wood, Nathaniel Milton, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Camden, Me., May 24, 1822, and was a graduate of Waterville College in the class of 1844. For a year after leaving college he was private tutor in the family of Gen. Browning, of Columbus, Miss. He pursued his theological studies at Covington, Ky., and was ordained as pastor of the Baptist Church in Bloomfield, Me., May 13, 1848, where he remained four years. The following eight years he was pastor of the Baptist Church in Waterville, Me. His next pastorates were at Lewiston and Thomaston, Me., and Upper Alton, Ill., until March, 1872, when he was elected professor of systematic theology in Shurtleff College. The state of his health compelled him to resign his office in June, 1874. He returned east, and lived a little over two years, dying at Camden, his native place, Aug. 2, 1876. (J. C. S.)

Wood, Samuel (1), D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Mansfield, Conn., May 11, 1752. From an early period he determined to enter the ministry, but it was not till he was twenty-two years old that he began his preparation for it. Under Rev. Isaiah Potter, of Lebanon, N. H., he prepared to enter Dartmouth College, from which he graduated in 1779. Seven weeks after his graduation he was licensed to preach. In October, 1781, he accepted a call to the Church at Boscawen, and here he continued to preach until May, 1802. A new society was formed in the town at that time, and of this, although the smaller parish, he became the pastor. He never fully recovered from an attack of a violent disease in 1828. Rev. Salmon Bennett was installed as colleague pastor with Dr. Wood in December, 1832, but after four years Dr. Wood was again sole pastor. For twenty years he officiated gratuitously as superintendent of the schools in the town; and was influential in establishing a library and an academy. He died in Boscawen, N. H., Dec. 24, 1836. He fitted a large number of young men for college. He was an earnest and impressive preacher. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 169.

Woodbridge, Benjamin, D.D., a Congregational minister, brother of Rev. John Woodbridge of Newbury, Mass., was born in Wiltshire, England, in 1622. He removed to America, and was the first graduate of Harvard College. Returning to England, he succeeded the famous Dr. Twiss at Newbury, where he gained a great reputation as a preacher, scholar, and casuist. Having been ejected in 1662 on account of his nonconformity, he continued to preach privately; and in 1671 resumed his public labors. He had been minister of Newbury nearly forty years, and died at Inglefield, Berks, Nov. 1, 1684. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 131.

Woodbridge, Timothy, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Stockbridge, Mass., Nov. 24, 1784. His maternal grandfather was the first president Edwards, and his paternal ancestry embraced a long line of venerable ministers, reaching back to the very early settlement of New England. He was educated at Williams College, and while there he lost the sight of both eyes, and the remainder of his life was passed in total blindness. In 1809 he entered the Theological Seminary at Andover, and in due time was regularly licensed to preach; in 1816 he was ordained pastor of the Church at Green River, Columbia Co., N. Y., where he continued, laboring with great zeal and diligence, twenty-six years; in 1842 he became pastor of the Church at Spencertown, N. Y., where he remained till 1851, when he resigned his pastoral charge; since that time he lived in comparative retirement until his death, Dec. 7, 1862. Dr. Woodbridge had an intellect of much more than common vigor, and a memory that held everything deposited in it. His preaching was evangelical, earnest, impressive. "It may reasonably be doubted whether, as a 'blind preacher,' he had his equal since the days of Waddel." He published The Autobiography of a Blind Preacher (Boston, 1856, 12mo), including sketches of the men and events of his time. See Parton, Life of Burr, ch. xxxiii; Sprague, Discourse at the Funeral of Rev. Timothy Woodbridge, D.D. (Albany, 1863, 8vo); Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 325; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (J. L. S.)

Woodford, SAMUEL, D.D., an English divine, was born in London in 1636, and educated at Wadham College, Oxford. He studied law at the Inner Temple, but entered into holy orders in 1669. He became rector of Hartley-Maudit, Hampshire; prebendary of Chichester in 1676, and of Winchester in 1680. He died in 1700. He was the author of, A Poem on the Return of King Charles II (1660);—A Paraphrase upon the Psalms of David (1667);—and A Paraphrase upon the Canticles and Some Select Hymns of the New and Old Testaments, with Other Occasional Compositions in English Verse (1679). In this last he examines Milton's blank verse and commends his recently published Paradise Lost. See Wood (Bliss's ed.), Athenæ Ozoniensis, iv, 731.

Woodhouse, JOHN CHAPPEL, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1748, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated A.M. in 1778. He became rector of Donnington in the same year, prebendary of Rochester in 1797, prebendary of Lichfield and archdeacon of Salop in 1798, dean of Lichfield in 1807, and rector of Stoke-upon-Trent in 1814. He died Nov. 17, 1833. He published The Apocalypse, or Revelation of St. John, Translated; with Notes, Critical, etc. (1805);—Annotations on the Apocalypse, etc. (1828);—and some Sermons. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Woodhull, John, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born in Suffolk County, L. I., Jan. 26, 1744. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1766, studied theology privately, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Newcastle, Aug. 10, 1768, and was ordained and installed pastor of the Leacock congregation, Lancaster Co., Pa., Aug. 1, 1770. In 1779 he became pastor of a congregation in Freehold, N. J., where he remained until his death, Nov. 22, 1824. Dr. Woodhull was a popular and useful minister, distinguished for his skill and tact in ecclesiastical bodies. He published a Sermon in the New Jersey Preacher (1813). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 304; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Timlow, Hist. Sermon.

Woodhull, Selah Strong, D.D., a (Dutch) Reformed minister, was born in New York city, Aug. 4, 1786. At the age of twelve, while a freshman in Columbia College, he lost both his parents. He then went to Yale College, graduated in 1802, studied theology under his uncle, Rev. Dr. Woodhull, of Freehold, N. J., and afterwards at Princeton with Dr. Henry Kollock, and was licensed to preach at the age of nineteen by the Presbytery of New Brunswick (1805). After one year of service as pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Boundbrook, N. J., he removed to Brooklyn, and until 1825 continued the popular and useful minister of the First Reformed Church in that city. He was then (1825) elected by the General Synod of the Church as professor of ecclesiastical history and pastoral theology in the Theological Seminary, and by the trustees of Rutgers College as their professor of metaphysics and philosophy. These eminent positions he accepted, and entered upon his duties with ardor in November of that year. But, after only four months of hard labor, he died from an inflammatory fever, Feb. 27, 1826. For five years he was secretary for domestic correspondence of the American Bible Society (1820-25), an office which he discharged until his removal to New Brunswick with great assiduity and success. In 1814 he held a commission as chaplain in the United States army, and officiated during part of the existing war with Great Britain. He was stated clerk of the General Synod, 1818-20, and its president in 1821. His great business capacity led to his selection for these and many other important positions, in all of which he commanded universal confidence. He was the impersonation of activity, decision, energy, and persevering industry. He was a diligent student, a faithful pastor, an instructive, methodical, solemn, earnest, practical, graceful, and attractive preacher. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ix, 161-164; Livingston [Dr. J. H.], Memoir, p. 401-402; Corwin, Manual of the Reformed Church in America, p. 271. (W. J. R. T.)

Woodroffe, BENJAMIN, D.D., an English clergyman, was born at Oxford in 1638, and was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he became a tutor. He became chaplain to her Majesty's ship "Royal Prince," and prebendary of Oxford in 1672, prebendary of Lichfield in 1678, principal of Gloucester Hall in 1692, and died in 1711. He published The Fall of Babylon (1690) and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Woods, James Sterrett, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born in Cumberland County, Pa., April 18, 1793. He pursued his academical studies in Hopewell Academy, Pa.; graduated at Dickinson College, Pa.; studied theology in the Princeton Theological Seminary, N. J.; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1817; and labored as an evangelist from 1819 to 1822 in the valley of the Juniata, embracing MacVeytown, Newton, Hamilton, and Shireleysburg, where he laid the foundations of the present churches. In 1822 he was called to take charge of the Lewistown and MacVeytown churches; in 1823 he became pastor of the Church of Lewistown alone, and remained there until the time of his death in 1862. "Dr. Woods," says Rev. G. Elliott, "was remarkable for his candor, his modesty, and his magnanimity." To the work of preaching the Gospel he devoted his life. Textual, evangelical, methodical, and earnest, his preaching everywhere commanded attention and secured edification. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1863, p. 216. (J. L. S.)

Woods, Leonard, D.D., an eminent Congregational divine, was born at Princeton, Mass., June 19, 1774. His father had intended him for a farmer; but, as he early exhibited a strong desire for knowledge, his mother's wishes at last gained the ascendancy, and he was sent to school at Leicester under Prof. Ebenezer Adams, and graduated at Harvard College in 1796 with the highest honor. He left college with a mind imbued with Priestley's speculations and unsettled by materialistic notions. He taught school at Medford for eight months, also pursuing a systematic course of reading. He was interested, however, in his spiritual welfare, and, by the advice of his college and life-long friend, Dr. John H. Church, he read the Life of Doddridge and other spiritual books, and after many hard struggles he came out into the light and liberty of the Gospel. He now put himself under the theological training of Dr. Charles Backus of Somers, and in 1798 was ordained pastor of the Church in Newbury, Mass. In 1808 the Andover Theological Seminary was established, Dr. Spring giving up, for the sake of unity and harmony, his project of an institution to be founded at Newburyport in the interests of Hopkinsian theology. Mr. Woods was appointed professor of theology, and held that position until his retirement in 1846. The remainder of his life was spent in preparing for the press his theological lectures and miscellaneous writings, and in writing a history of Andover Theological Seminary, which he left unfinished. He died Aug. 24, 1854.

In his theological opinions, Dr. Woods was an orthodox Calvinist, accepting the Assembly's confession and catechism in the simple, historical sense of the language. He was on terms of intimacy and friendship with some Hopkinsian divines, and he considered their divergences non-essential, never publicly controverting their views lest their differences should give advantage to those who were assailing the common faith. He had a fondness for metaphysical studies, and qualifications for distinguished success in them. Facts, among which he gave the highest place to those of revelation, were the starting-point in his philosophy. From these, by careful induction, he came to general laws, then to a lawgiver, then to a universal government. Dr. Woods was patient, cautious, and earnest in his investigations, and his attainments came, not by genius, but by steadily pressing his inquiries further and further into the domain of science. "He is emphatically the 'judicious' divine of later New England theology" (H. B. Smith, D.D.). As a theological instructor, Dr. Woods was successful. His pupils, of whom he had over one thousand, loved and venerated him. As a preacher, he was simple, lucid, scriptural, and instructive, yet he was often argumentative and taxed reason to her utmost, though never submitting the mysteries of godliness to her arbitration. As a writer, he was clear, pure, transparent, rigidly Anglo-Saxon. "It is for his qualities as a man, a neighbor, a friend, and a Christian," says Dr. E. A. Lawrence, one of his pupils, "that he will be cherished in most grateful and affectionate remembrance." He had an open, manly character, the constant outflow of kindly feeling towards all, a warmth of affection and friendship, an humble piety, which made him peculiarly beloved by all who knew him. Dr. Woods took an important part in establishing those various benevolent societies and reforms which are an important feature of the 19th century.

Besides many occasional sermons and orations, tracts for the Doctrinal Tract Society, and articles in the most prominent religious periodicals of his day, the following are Dr. Woods's most important works: Letters to Unitarians (Andover, 1820, 8vo):—Reply to Dr. Ware's Letters to Trinitarians and Calvinists (ibid. 1821):—Remarks on Dr. Ware's Answer (ibid. 1822):—Lectures on the Inspiration of the Scriptures (ibid. 1829; Glasgow, 1838, 12mo):—Letters to Rev. Nathaniel W. Taylor, D.D. (1830):—Memoirs of American Missionaries (1833, 12mo):—Examination of the Doctrine of Perfection as Held by Rev. Asa Mahan and Others (1841):—Reply to Mr. Mahan (eod.):—Lectures on Church Government, containing Objections to the Episcopal Scheme (N. Y. 1843, 12mo):—Lectures on Swedenborgianism (1846):—Theological Lectures and Miscellaneous Letters, Essays, and Sermons (Andover, 1849-50, 5 vols. 8vo), highly recommended by Drs. Hodge, Burder, etc.:—Theology of the Puritans (1851). Dr. Woods contributed to Sprague's Annals, an Introductory Essay to Wardlaw's Christian Ethics (N. Y. 1836), and wrote other monographs. Woodward, JOSIAH, D.D., an English clergyman, was minister of Poplar, and afterwards of Maidstone, and preached the Boyle Lecture in 1712. He published numerous works, among which may be noted Six Sermons to Young Persons (1697):—Fair Warnings to a Careless World (eod.):—Necessary Duty of Family Prayer (1704):—Divine, Original, and Incomparable Excellence of the Christian Religion as Founded on the Holy Scriptures (Boyle Lecture, 1712):—and Young Man's Monitor (13th ed. 1802). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Woolley, JOHN, D.D., D.C.L., an English clergyman, was born in 1816; studied at University College, London, and Exeter College, Oxford, graduating in 1836. He became successively head-master of Rossall School, Lancashire, and of King Edward's Grammar-school, Norwich. He resigned the latter position in 1852, on becoming professor of logic and the classics in the University of Sydney, Australia, of which he was elected principal. In 1865 he paid a visit to England, and on his return voyage was lost in the "London," Jan. 11, 1866. He published, Introduction to Logic (1840):—Sermon at Rossall College (1847):—and Lectures Delivered in Australia (1863). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Woolton, JOHN, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Wigan, Lancashire, in 1535. He entered as student of Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1553, and fled to his uncle, Dean Nowell, and the other exiles in Germany, in 1555. He returned to England in Queen Elizabeth's reign, and was made canon residentiary of Exeter. He also had the living of Spaxton, in the Diocese of Wells, and in 1575 became warden of Manchester College. In 1579 he was consecrated bishop of Exeter, and continued in that office until his death, March 13, 1593 (O. S.). He was the author of, Christian Manuell; or, The Life and Manners of True Christians (1576):—An Armour of Proufe (eod.):—Of the Conscience; a Discourse (eod.):—A Treatise of the Immortality of the Soule (eod.):—Neue Anatomie of Whole Man (eod.):—The Castell of Christians and Fortresse of the Faithfull (1577):—and David's Chain.

Woolworth, AARON, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Longmeadow, Mass., Oct. 25, 1763. He graduated at Yale College in 1784; studied theology privately; was licensed to preach by the Eastern Association of New London County; and was ordained and installed pastor of the Church in Bridgehampton, April 30, 1787. Several powerful revivals of religion occurred under his ministry, particularly one in 1800, an account of which was published in connection with Dr. Buell's Narrative of an Extensive Revival in East Hampton. He died April 2, 1821. Dr. Woolworth was a man of remarkably sound judgment, deep piety and power as a preacher. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 468; Prime, Hist. of Long Island; Phillips, Funeral Sermon.

Worcester, NOAH, D.D., a Unitarian Congregational minister, was born at Hollis, N. H., Nov. 25, 1758. His opportunities for going to school ceased altogether in the winter of 1774-75. He joined the army as a fifer in the spring of 1775, and continued in the service eleven months. In the campaign of 1777 he was in the army again for two months as fife major. In the winter of 1776-77 he was engaged in teaching school at Plymouth, and followed this occupation for nine successive winters. In Feb. 1782, he removed from Plymouth to Thornton, where he united with the Congregational Church. He engaged for some time in the study of theological questions in connection with his ordinary labors, and was licensed to preach in 1786. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Congregational Church at Thornton, on Oct. 18 following. He travelled in the employ of the New Hampshire Missionary Society in 1803-4 in Northern New Hampshire. In 1810 he removed to Salisbury as assistant to his brother Thomas, and remained three years. In 1813 he removed to Brighton, Mass., and began to edit The Christian Disciple, in which relation he continued until the close of 1818. In 1819 he became editor of The Friend of Peace, a quarterly which he conducted for ten years. He died at Brighton, Oct. 31, 1837. Among his publications may be mentioned Solemn Reasons for Declining to Adopt the Baptist Theory and Practice (1809):—Bible News; or, Sacred Truths relating to the Living God, his only Son, and Holy Spirit (1810):—Impartial Review of the Testimonies in Favor of the Divinity of the Son of God (1810):—Respectful Address to the Trinitarian Clergy (1812):—Solemn Review of the Custom of War, by Philo Pacificus (1814): and The Atoning Sacrifice a Display of Love, not of Wrath (1829). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 191.

Worcester, Samuel, D.D., an eminent Congregational minister and author, was born at Hollis, N. H., Nov. 1, 1770. He was of pious ancestry, being a descendant in the sixth generation of Rev. William, and in the third of Rev. Francis, Worcester. Every opportunity for mental improvement was seized at the house of his father, who was a farmer, and at the age of twenty-one Samuel was possessed of an ardent desire for a thorough education. He therefore entered the New Ipswich Academy, working his own way, and afterwards Dartmouth College, graduating with the highest honors in 1795. He studied theology with Dr. Austin, of Worcester, taught school at Hollis, and was principal of the New Ipswich Academy, 1796. The following year he was ordained pastor of the Church at Fitchburg, a society which was cursed by all the evils of the Half-way Covenant—including among its members Deists, Arians, Universalists, and the openly immoral. With decision, inflexible integrity, and solemn faithfulness to truth and duty, Worcester opened the batteries of the Gospel upon the errors and sins that called for rebuke. As a result, in the ensuing spring, the covenant was revised and an orthodox creed adopted, and in 1799 an extensive revival occurred. A malignant spirit of opposition, however, was all the time developed, and finally, under the leading of the Universalists, was openly manifested. Under this influence, the town voted a dissolution of their contract with the pastor, but a council of the Church unanimously decided that he should remain. His opponents now conceived the design of organizing themselves into the First Church in Fitchburg, thus enabling them to take the place of the church of which Worcester was pastor, in the legal relations of the town to the minister. Several ex parte councils were called for this purpose, but they failed in accomplishing their designs. The point of contention ultimately arrived at was whether the town should control the Church with reference to the selection or dismissal of her ministers, or whether the Church should do this with the concurrence of the town acting as the parish, "according to the uniform ecclesiastical usage of New England." This, the biographer of Dr. Worcester remarks, was the first organized attempt in Massachusetts at such a subjection of the Church. The fearlessness, ability, patience, and skill of the pastor foiled the efforts of the disaffected, and the Church was saved from civil bondage. A mutual council was at length chosen according to ecclesiastical usage, the Church and pastor were sustained, and—at his own request—he was regularly dismissed, Aug. 29, 1802. The following year he was installed over the Tabernacle Church, Salem, Mass., where he had an eminently happy, useful, and successful pastorate. In 1804 he declined a professorship of theology in Dartmouth College.

In promoting the cause of missions and the circulation of the Scriptures, Dr. Worcester was very laborious. From 1803 to 1808, he was the editor of the Massachusetts Missionary Magazine, for five years he was the secretary of the Massachusetts Missionary Society, and on the death of Dr. Spring he was chosen its president. His duties were important and arduous. He aided in the formation of the Massachusetts Bible Society, its constitution and the Address to the Public having been prepared chiefly by him. It was on a ride in a chaise with Dr. Spring from Andover to Bradford to attend the General Association of Massachusetts that the first idea of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, in its form and administration, was suggested and developed. The Association (1810) instituted the Board, Dr. Worcester being appointed one of the nine, and at the first meeting thereof he was chosen corresponding secretary. He came into his new office with resources of intellect and of heart which were equal to the great responsibilities and toils imposed upon him. "His plans of benevolent action were based upon fundamental principles, and would bear the most thorough analysis; and for the same reason, the measures of the American Board adopted in the early years of its existence are marked by pre-eminent wisdom; and the distinguished men who have followed him in office have found little occasion to alter them." Dr. Worcester's constitution at length began to give way under the load of his exertions as pastor and secretary. A colleague pastor was installed in 1819, thus relieving him of three fourths of his ministerial work. In 1821 he took a voyage to New Orleans, with the intention of visiting the Choctaw and Cherokee nations for the double purpose of recruiting his health and promoting the Indian missions. The trip irritated rather than mitigated his disease. The weather during his stay in New Orleans and the journey northward was unpropitious. After much suffering, he reached Mayhew, in the Choctaw nation, and eighteen days after, Brainerd, Tenn. He was now so weak that he had to be carried into the mission-house. He lingered resignedly for a few days, and on June 7, 1821, passed peacefully away.

As a preacher, Dr. Worcester was doctrinal, faithful, and luminous, though his manner was neither easy nor graceful; as a pastor, he was diligent, sympathetic, the poor and the sick sharing his special care. He had considerable musical talent, instructed in sacred music, and gave lectures on church psalmody and music. His influence was felt much in ecclesiastical councils, and he was often called upon to adjudicate disputes and settle difficulties. He was a powerful debater, and some of his speeches were seldom rivalled even in judicial and legislative assemblies. Dr. Worcester ever sympathized with his ministerial brethren, and fraternized with those of other denominations. In spite of his catholicity of sentiment and peace-loving disposition, he was thrice drawn into controversy. The publications resulting therefrom are considered to class with the ablest ever written in the history of religious dispute.

Besides numerous Sermons, Orations, and Addresses, Dr. Worcester is the author of the following: Six Sermons on the Doctrine of Eternal Judgment (1800):—Summary View of the Fitchburg Ecclesiastical Affairs (1802):—Discourses on the Covenant with Abraham (Salem, 1805, 8vo):—Letters on Baptism to the Rev. Thomas Baldwin (1807):—Christian Psalmody (1814, 4 pts.):—Three Letters to Dr. W. E. Channing (Boston, 1815, 8vo). In some respects these Letters are the greatest work of his life. They were occasioned by Channing's Reply to Jeremiah Evarts's Review of American Unitarianism in the Panoplist. The controversy eventuated in the doctrinal division of the Congregational churches of Massachusetts. The Panoplist and Drs. Morse, Spring, and Worcester saved American Congregationalism from the advancing Unitarian tide:—Watts's Hymns and Selections (ibid. 1818). More than 300,000 have been circulated:—Sermons (posthumous, 1823, 8vo):—First Ten Reports of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (1810-20; repub. 1834). His Letters to Dr. Channing in connection with the Unitarian controversy, especially the last one, have been considered as almost unrivalled specimens of polemical theological discussion. His published Sermons are rich in evangelical thought, and logically and luminously presented by R. Anderson, D.D., in the Memorial Volume of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (1862), p. 114. Of his three ministerial brothers—Noah, Thomas, and Leonard—the two former were able writers on the Unitarian side. His son, the Rev. Samuel M., D.D., became an author of some repute. See Cong. Quar. 1862, p. 131-160 (by Dr. Clark); Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 398 sq.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s.v.; also Missionary Herald, Aug. 1821 (by Everts); Life and Labors of Dr. Worcester (Boston, 1852, 2 vols. 12mo), by his son; North Amer. Rev. April, 1862.

Wordsworth, CHRISTOPHER, D.D., an English clergyman, youngest brother of William Wordsworth, the poet, was born at Cockermouth, Cumberland, June 9, 1774. He was educated at Hawkeshead grammar-school and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1796. He was elected fellow of Trinity College Oct. 1, 1798. He became domestic chaplain to Dr. Manners Sutton, archbishop of Canterbury; rector of Ashby and Obey-with-Thirne, Norfolk, in 1804; and dean of Bocking, Essex, May 30, 1808. He was appointed rector of St. Mary's, Lambeth, Surrey, and of Sundridge, Kent, April 10, 1816; and soon after served as chaplain to the House of Commons. On July 26, 1820, he was installed master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and in the same year exchanged the livings of Lambeth and Sundridge for the rectory of Buxted, with Uckfield, in Sussex. He resigned the mastership of Trinity College in 1841, and thereafter resided at Buxted, where he died, Feb. 2, 1846. He published, Six Letters to Granville Sharp, Esq., respecting his Remarks on the Definitive Article in the Greek Text of the New Testament (1802);—Ecclesiastical Biography (1810);—Sermons on Various Subjects (1814);—Who Wrote Εἰκὼν Βασιλική? and another work on the same subject, in both of which he attributes it to king Charles I.;—Christian Institutes (1836);—and other works.

Wormwood (ῥυζῖ, laanáh, of uncertain etymology; Sept. πικρία, χορὴ, δδύνη, and ἀνίχνη; Vulg. amaritudo, absinthium) is, doubtless, the correct translation of the Heb. word, which occurs frequently in the Bible, and generally in a metaphorical sense, as in Deut. xxix, 18, where of the idolatrous Israelites it is said, "Lest there be among you a root that beareth wormwood" (see also Prov. v, 4). In Jer. ix, 15; xxiii, 13; Lam. iii, 15, 19, wormwood is symbolical of bitter calamity and sorrow. Unrighteous judges are said to "turn judgment to wormwood" (Amos v, 7; so in vi, 12, "hemlock"). In like manner the name of the star, which, at the sound of the third angel's trumpet, fell upon the rivers, was called Wormwood (Ἀψιθός; Rev. viii, 11). The Orientals typified sorrows, cruelties, and calamities of any kind by plants of a poisonous or bitter nature. Some other plants have been adduced, as the colocynth and the oleander, but without anything to support them; while different kinds of artemisia and of wormwood are proverbial for their bitterness, and often used in a figurative sense by ancient authors.

"Parce, precor, lacerare tuum, nec amara paternis Admiscere vells, ceu mellis absinthia, verbis" (Paulin. Ep. ad Ausonium).

Celsius has no doubt that a species of artemisia, or wormwood, is intended: "Hanc plantam amaram in Judea et Arabia copiose nascentem, et interpretum auctoritate egregie suffultam, ipsam esse Ebraeorum לעכר, pro indubitato habemus." That species of artemisia are common in Syria and Palestine is well known, as all travellers mention their abundance in particular Common Wormwood (Artemisia absinthium).

situations; but as many of them resemble each other very closely in properties, it is more difficult to determine what particular species is meant. It is probable, indeed, that the name is used in a generic rather than a specific sense. Artemisia is the botanical name of the genus of plants in which the different species of wormwoods are found. The plants of this genus are easily recognised by the multitude of fine divisions into which the leaves are usually separated, and the numerous clusters of small, round, drooping, greenish-yellow, or brownish flower-heads with which the branches are laden. It must be understood that our common wormwood (Artemisia absinthium) does not appear to exist in Palestine, and cannot, therefore, be that specially denoted by the scriptural term. Indeed, it is more than probable that the word is intended to apply to all the plants of this class that grew in Palestine, rather than to any one of them in particular. The examples of this genus that have been found in that country are—1. Artemisia Judaica, which, if a particular species be intended, is probably the absinthium of Scripture. Ranwolf found it about Bethlehem, and Shaw in Arabia and the deserts of Numidia plentifully. This plant is erect and shrubby, with a stem about eighteen inches high. Its taste is very bitter; and both the leaves and seeds are much used in Eastern medicine, and are reputed to be tonic, stomachic, and anthelmintic. 2. Artemisia Romana, which was found by Hasselquist on Mount Tabor (p. 281). This species is herbaceous, erect, with a stem one or two feet high (higher when cultivated in gardens), and nearly upright branches. The plant has a pleasantly aromatic scent, and the bitterness of its taste is so tempered by the aromatic flavor as scarcely to be disagreeable. 3. Artemisia abrotanum, found in the south of Europe, as well as in Syria and Palestine, and eastward even to China. This is a hoary plant, becoming a shrub in warm countries, and its branches bear loose paricles of nodding yellow flower-heads. It is bitter and aromatic, with a very strong scent. It is not much used in medicine, but the branches are employed in imparting a yellow dye to wool. The species most celebrated in Arabian works on materia medica is that called shih, which is conspicuous for its bitterness and for being fatal to worms; hence it has been commonly employed as an anthelmintic even to our own times. This seems to be the same species which was found by Rauwolf in Palestine, and which he says the Arabs call scheha. It is his "Absinthium santonicum, scheha Arabum, unde semen lumblicorum colligitur," the Absinthium santonicum Judaicum of Caspar Bauhin, in his Pinnaz, now Artemisia Judaica, though it is probable two or three species yield the Semom santonicum, or worm-wood of commerce, which, instead of seed, consists of the tops of the plants, and in which the peduncles, calyx flowers, and young seeds are intermixed. Artemisia maritima and Judaica are two of the plants which yield it. Worthington, John, D.D., an English divine, was born at Manchester, in February, 1618. He was educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow, and was created B.D. in 1646. He was chosen master of Jesus College, but resigned the office soon after the Restoration. In the meantime he was successively rector of Horton, Buckinghamshire; Gravely, and Fen Ditton, in the County of Cambridge; Barking, with Needham, Suffolk; and Ingoldsby, Lincolnshire. In 1663 he was collated to the rectory of Moulton-All-saints, Norfolk, and entered upon the cure of St. Bene't-Fink in June, 1664, under the canon of Windsor, and continued to preach there until the church was destroyed by fire in February, 1666. Shortly after this, he was presented to the living of Ingoldsby, Lincolnshire, and the prebend of Asgarby in the Church of Lincoln. He removed to Hackney in 1670, and died there, Nov. 26, 1671. He was the author of, Form of Sound Words; or, A Scripture Catechism (1674);—The Great Duty of Self-resignation to the Divine Will (1675);—The Doctrines of the Resurrection and the Reward to Come (1690);—Miscellanies (1704);—and other works.

Worthington, Thomas, D.D., an English divine, was born at Blainscough, Lancashire, about 1552. He was educated at Oxford, and entered the English College at Douay in 1573, and the English College at Rheims (having in the meantime become a priest) in 1578. He labored as a missionary in England for some years; was imprisoned in the Tower in 1584, and banished in 1585. He was president of the English College at Douay from 1599 to 1613. He spent his latter years in England, and died in Staffordshire, six months after he became a Jesuit, in 1626. He published, Annotations on the Old Testament (1609);—Catalogus Martyrum Pontificiorum, etc. (1612);—An Anker of Christian Doctrine, wherein the most Principal Pointes of Catholique Religion are Proved by the only Written Word of God, etc. (1618-22);—and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Worthington, William, D.D., a learned English divine, was born in Merionethshire in 1703, and educated at Oswestry School, whence he went to Jesus College, Oxford. He then returned to Oswestry and became usher in that school. He took the degree of A.M. at Cambridge in 1742, and that of D.D. at Jesus College, Oxford, in 1758. He became vicar of Llany-bodwell, in the County of Salop, and afterwards of Llan-rhaiadr, Denbighshire, where he died, Oct. 6, 1778. He became prebendary of York in 1768, and of St. Asaph in 1778. He published numerous works, among which are, Essay on the Scheme, etc., of Man's Redemption (1743);—The Evidence of Christianity, etc. (1769);—and The Scripture Theory of the Earth (1773).

Wotton, William, D.D., an English divine, was born at Wrentham, Suffolk, Aug. 13, 1666. He was endowed with a remarkable memory, and by the time he was five years old had acquired, under the tuition of his father, considerable facility in translating Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. In April, 1676, when not yet ten years old, he was admitted to Catherine Hall, Cambridge, where he made rapid progress in the languages and other branches of learning. In 1679 he took the degree of A.B., and afterwards obtained a fellowship in St. John's. In 1691 he received the living of Llandrillo, Denbighshire, and was soon after made chaplain to the earl of Nottingham, who, in 1698, presented him to the rectory of Middleton Keynes, Buckinghamshire. He died at Buxted, Essex, Feb. 13, 1726. His publications are numerous, among which may be named, Reflections upon Ancient and Modern Learning (1694);—Hist. of Rome from the Death of Antoninus Pius to the Death of Severus Alexander (1701);—Discourse on the Confusion of Language at Babel (1730).

Wren, Christopher, D.D., an English clergyman, was fellow of St. John's College, Oxford, afterwards chaplain to Charles I, and rector of Knoyle, Wiltshire. He was made dean of Windsor in 1635, and presented to the rectory of Haseley, Oxfordshire, in 1638. He died at the house of his son-in-law, Mr. William Holder, at Blechingdon, in the County of Oxford, in 1698.

Wren, Matthew, D.D., an eminent English prelate, was born in the parish of St. Peter-cheap, London, Dec. 23, 1585. He was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and elected fellow of his college, Nov. 9, 1605. He studied divinity, and was admitted to holy orders in 1610. He was appointed chaplain to bishop Andrews, and presented to the rectory of Teversham, Cambridgeshire, in 1615. In 1621 he became chaplain to prince Charles, whom he attended in that office to Spain in 1623. He became rector of Bingham, Nottinghamshire, and prebendary of Winchester in 1624. In July, 1625, he was chosen master of Peterhouse, Cambridge, to which he became a great benefactor, building a large part of the college, and securing contributions for a chapel, which was completed in 1632. In July, 1628, he became dean of Windsor and Wolverhampton. He was sworn a judge of the Star-chamber for foreign causes in 1629; installed as prebendary of Westminster in 1634; promoted to the bishopric of Hereford the same year; and translated to the see of Norwich in 1635, where he remained about two years and a half. He succeeded Juxon as dean of his majesty's chapel in 1636, and was translated to the bishopric of Ely in May, 1638. In December, 1640, proceedings were begun in Parliament against him, and in July, 1641, he was impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors. The penalty was fixed at imprisonment in the Tower during the pleasure of the Parliament, which lasted eighteen years. When the Restoration drew nigh, he was released, in March, 1659, and returned to his palace at Ely in 1660. He died at Ely House, London, April 24, 1667. He published some Sermons and other works of no present interest.

Wright, Edward W., D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Lancaster, O., in April, 1817. He was educated at Miami University; studied divinity at the Princeton (N. J.) Theological Seminary, and finished in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., in 1838; was licensed and ordained as an evangelist by Logansport Presbytery in October, 1839; became pastor of the Church at Lafayette, Ind., in 1840; agent in the West for the Presbyterian Board of Education in 1845; pastor of the Church in Delphi in 1846, which relation continued for a period of twenty years. His labors there were greatly blessed. The Church grew and became a feeder to new churches beyond. He was stated clerk of the Synod of Northern Indiana from the time of its formation in 1842 until his removal to Allegheny, and also of the Presbytery of Logansport for about the same length of time. It was generally admitted that, "as a presbyter, he had no equal in all the synod." At length he was elected and served as librarian of the Board of Colportage of Pittsburgh and Allegheny synods, and soon afterwards he removed his family to Allegheny. He died Sept. 17, 1866. Dr. Wright was an instructive preacher: "He did not appeal to the sympathies or the passions, but rather to the reason and the consciences of the people. He took no crude materials into the pulpit; his sermons always afforded proof of patient and prayerful study, and they were delivered in a solemn and reverential manner." See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Allemanac, 1867, p. 219.

Wright, John Flavel, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in North Carolina, July 30, 1795, and passed his early years in the northern part of that state. He was converted in 1813, and soon after began to feel it his duty to become a preacher of the Gospel. He was licensed to exhort in August, 1814, and assisted for some months in the work of a large circuit. He was admitted on trial in the Virginia Conference at Lynchburg, Feb. 20, 1815, and appointed successively to Hanover, Black River, Guilford, Princess Ann, and Newbern circuits, and Raleigh station. In 1821 he was transferred to the Ohio Conference, and appointed to Lebanon Circuit. He was next appointed to Cincinnati, then to Madison, Ind., and in 1824 to Chillicothe, O., where three hundred and sixty-five were added to the Church, and more than that number converted. In 1827 he was stationed a second time at Cincinnati, and in 1829 became presiding elder of the Lebanon District. In 1832 he was elected book-agent at Cincinnati, and fulfilled the duties of that office for twelve years in succession. In 1844 he lacked but a few votes of an election to the episcopacy. From that time until 1861 he received various appointments in Ohio. He was chaplain of the First Kentucky Regiment during the Rebellion, and near the close of the war became chaplain to the military hospitals of Cincinnati. He again entered the conference work when the hospitals were closed, and continued in that field until 1877, when he retired. He died Sept. 13, 1879. See Minutes of Cincinnati Conference, 1880, p. 86.

Wright, Samuel, D.D., an eminent English Dissenter, was born at Retford, Nottinghamshire, Jan. 3, 1683. He was pastor at Blackfriars, London, from 1707 to 1734, when he removed to a meeting-house in Carter Lane, Southwark, and died April 3, 1746. He published, A Little Treatise of Being Born Again (1715):—Treatise on the Religious Observance of the Lord's Day (8d ed. 1726):—Human Virtues; or, Rules to Live Soberly (1730):—Deceitfulness of Sin (1731):—and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Wulfram (or Wulfrann), St., apostle to the Frisians and bishop of Sens, was of patrician family, and was born about A.D. 650, at Milly. He became monk and abbot at Fontenelle, to which monastery he donated his family-seat of Milly, and afterwards was chaplain to the French court, and bishop of Sens. In 684 or 685 he devoted himself, with several brother monks, to the missionary work among the Frisians, his personal associate for a time being a Burgundian count named Gangulf or Gengulf, who was afterwards killed by a clergyman, the paramour of his wife. Wulfram is credited, while in the prosecution of his missionary labors, with having recovered a lost paten from the sea by prayer; with having cured paralytics and other invalids by anointing them with oil; with having preserved alive a boy who was hanged by the Frisians in honor of their divinities, and two other boys who were about to be drowned from similar motives. Tradition states that Wulfram was on the point of baptizing Radbod, the Frisian king, when the latter, standing with one foot in the water, inquired whether his unbaptized ancestors were to be found in heaven or in hell, and being assured that they were in hell, withdrew his foot and declared that he would not be separated from his royal ancestors. The devil thereupon appeared to the king and incited him to persist in idolatry, until he was driven away by the sign of the cross. Radbod, however, died unbaptized. Wulfram, about 689, returned to Fontenelle, and died in 695 (others say 720 or 740). The martyrologies assign to him March 20. See Bolland, Acta SS. Martyr. (Antw. 1668), iii, p. 143-165; Rettberg, Kirchengesch. Deutschlands (Gött. 1848), p. 574 sq., and the literature there referred to; also Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

Wulstan (Wulfstan, or Wolstan) (1), a monk of Winchester, lived in the 9th century. He was the author of a work on the Harmony of Tones, a poem in Latin hexameters on the Miracles of St. Swithin, and a prose Life of Bishop Ethelwold. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Wulstan (2), an English prelate of the 11th century, became archbishop of York in 1003, holding along with that dignity the bishopric of Worcester, and died in 1023. He is supposed to be the author of the Anglo-Saxon Homilies, to which is affixed the name of Lupus Episcopus. One of these may be found in Hickeys, Thesaurus, iii, 99-106. See Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. (Anglo-Saxon Period), p. 505.

Wulstan (3), the last of the Anglo-Saxon prelates, was born at Icentum, Warwickshire, about 1007. He was educated at Evesham and Peterborough, and was ordained a presbyter at the usual age. He then became a monk at Worcester, and gradually rose in that monastery until at last he became prior. In 1062 he was chosen bishop of Worcester, and succeeded in rescuing that see from the control of the archbishop of York. He enjoyed the favor of William the Conqueror, and after him of his son Rufus. He rebuilt the Cathedral of Worcester; put down an insurrection of the adherents of Duke Robert of Normandy; and defended the city against an army of the rebels led by Roger de Montgomery. He died in Worcester, either on Nov. 23 or Jan. 19, 1095. He is not known to have written anything either in Saxon or Latin, though an attempt has been made to prove that he was the author of the entries in the Saxon Chronicle from 1084 to 1079. See William of Malmesbury, De Gestis Pontificum; Wharton, Anglia Sacra, vol. ii.

Wyatt, William E., D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, a native of New York city, was ordained deacon in 1810, and priest shortly after. In 1811 he was pastor of St. John's Parish, Newtown, L. I.; in 1814 he became associate rector of St. Paul's Parish, Baltimore, subsequently succeeding to the rectorship, which he retained until the close of his life. He died June 24, 1864, aged seventy-six years. Through all this period he was a member of the Standing Committee of his diocese; was delegate to every General Convention; and during thirty years was president of the Lower House. In 1820 he was professor of theology in the University of Maryland. He published a volume of Family Prayers:—a volume of Bishop Kemp's Sermons:—the Christian Alar:—and a number of pamphlets, tracts, etc. See American Quar. Church Rev. Oct. 1864, p. 483.

Wyckhoff, William H., LL.D., a minister of the Baptist denomination, was born in the city of New York, Sept. 10, 1807, and was a graduate of Union College in the class of 1828. After leaving college, he was for several years the principal of the classical department of a collegiate school in New York. In 1839 he became the editor of The Baptist Advocate, now The Examiner and Chronicle, which was started by him, and has exerted a wide influence in the denomination. Of this paper he had the editorial charge until 1846, in which year he was ordained as a minister of the Gospel by the Laight Street Baptist Church of New York. For several years he was the President of the Young Men's City Missionary Society, of the Baptist Domestic Mission Society, and was one of the originators of the American and Foreign Bible Society, formed in 1835. Of this society he was the corresponding secretary from 1846 to 1850. In 1850 he aided in the formation of the American Bible Union, of which, for a time, he was the secretary. He died in Brooklyn, N. Y., Nov. 2, 1876. Among his published writings are The Bible Question; or, The American Bible Society and the Baptists:—The Bible, its Excellence:—Rollin's Ancient History, Condensed. (J. C. S.)

Wyckoff, Isaac Newton, D.D., a (Dutch) Reformed minister, was born near Millstone, N. J., in 1792. He graduated at Queen's College in 1813, and at New Brunswick Seminary in 1817. He was settled as pastor of the Reformed Church, Catskill, N. Y., from 1817 to 1836, and of the Second Reformed Church, Albany, from 1836 to 1866. He retired from active duty after forty-nine years of arduous clerical labor, about three years before his death, which occurred in 1869. Four new churches were organized by him in his first field of labor. At Albany more than one thousand persons were added to the communion of his Church during his ministry of thirty years. He was fond of books and study, and of literary and theological culture. But he was pre-eminently a pastor. He seemed to know everybody in his flock, and almost in the whole city. Young men found him a genial, sympathizing, and loving helper, for he never lost his youthful buoyancy. He was gifted with a wonderful flow of animal spirits. His presence was sunshine. His conversation overflowed with wit and humor, with irresistible drollery, and yet with a pious fervor which sanctified the whole man. To the emigrant Hollanders, who always stopped at Albany on their way to the Michigan Colony, he was for years a father and a priest. He conversed, read, and could preach in the Dutch language with great fluency. In every benevolent institution, in the boards of the Church, in all kinds of public assemblies where his influence could be well used, he was a representative speaker and actor. Among the sick, the anxious, the unconverted, the young and the aged alike, his personal and pastoral tact and power were universally admitted. His home was a Bethel, his hospitality unbounded, and his social intercourse entertaining and profitable. He was full of music, an art which he cultivated delightfully and skillfully, with voice and instrument. His piety was a flowing stream, sparkling, clear, unceasing, joyous, and refreshing to himself and to his people and friends. "The spontaneity of his faith precluded the indulgence of mere cant. The light of the cross was on his brow; the breath of Olivet animated his speech. To hear him pray in his family circle was to be borne up to the Mount of Vision." His religion was a life, never a burden, never a mere robe, but a principle in active operation—"a well of water in him springing up to everlasting life." His charity was wonderful, in thoughts, feelings, speech, gifts and deeds of love for Christ's sake. In ecclesiastical assemblies he was a peace-maker. His olive branch never withered in the heat of controversy. With nearly all the great movements of his Church for half a century he was prominently identified. He was a frequent speaker at the great May anniversaries in New York, and a number of his sermons are printed in the National Preacher, etc. His person was of medium size, slender, wiry, agile, and tough. His face was radiant with cheerfulness and goodness. His voice was large, full, sonorous, and he used it often with great oratorical effect. His mental ingenuity and freshness of thought and expression proclaimed him an original character. He was perfectly unique, always himself, and never much like other folks. He thought and talked, and preached and prayed, in his own peculiar way. He used many big words; he often made words and combinations of words that gave great point and pith to his sentences. His aim was direct; his sermons Biblical and expository; his style picturesque, homely, imaginative, instructive, tender, and evangelical. In mortuary discourses he excelled. Some of his memorial and funeral sermons, published in pamphlet form, and especially his many contributions to Dr. Sprague's Annals of the American Pulpit, are choice specimens of his descriptive and analytical sketches of character. Down to his old age he retained his youthful appearance and manner, with fresh complexion, and hair curling and unchanged in color. "His eye was not dim nor his natural strength abated" until his last illness laid its wasting hand upon him. See Porter [Dr. E. S.], Memorial Sermon. (W. J. R. T.)

Wyckoff, Theodore Frelinghuysen, a (Dutch) Reformed minister, son of the above, was born at Catskill, N. Y., in 1820. He graduated at Rutgers College in 1839, and at New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1842; was pastor of the Second Reformed Church of Ghent, N. Y., from 1843 to 1844; of the South Reformed Church, West Troy, from 1845 to 1854; and ministered at St. Thomas, W. I., in 1854-55. He died of yellow fever, Jan. 19 of the latter year, only a few weeks after his arrival in St. Thomas. He was a young man of cultivated mind and manners, a careful student, scholarly in his tastes and refined in accomplishments; he wrote much and well for the periodical press. His sermons were ornate in style, evangelical in matter and spirit, and full of promise. (W. J. R. T.)

Wycliffe, John, the first translator of the entire Bible into English, and "the morning-star of the Reformation," was also eminent as a scholar, a diplomatist, and a preacher. There seem to have been three other persons of the same name contemporaneous with him; one a seneschal of Merton College in 1356 (probably the author of a weak chiliastic treatise entitled The Last Age of the Church, usually attributed to the Reformer [ed. Todd, Dublin, 1840]), another who was master of Balliol College in 1340, and still another who was vicar of Mayfield from 1361 to 1380.

1. Antecedents.—The career and work of Wycliffe cannot well be appreciated without a brief review of some of the literary and ecclesiastical, and especially the Biblical, circumstances of the times.

1. The midnight of the Dark Ages had been broken by the establishment of high-schools, whose light was sensibly felt along the pathways of scientific and religious inquiry. Europe was emerging from the semi-barbarism which the northern hordes had poured over the older seats of civilization, and the invaders themselves, now Christianized and educated, were sending back streams of missionary and literary culture to their fatherlands. England was foremost in realizing these ameliorating influences. From the times of the Roman sway she had enjoyed pre-eminent advantages through contact with Latin Christianity, which then embodied all the learning and piety of the Western empire; and the displacement of the Britons by the Anglo-Saxons, and the subjugation of these in turn by the Normans, had added successively elements of refinement to her originally wild strength, as the compound English language itself attests to-day. At the period of which we write the French tongue was still used in courts of law, a vestige of which exists in many of the commonest legal terms to the present day; and side by side was the Latin as the medium of literary intercourse, which likewise is yet indicated by other legal titles of well-known processes. The English universities, established about two centuries prior to Wycliffe's graduation, and a little later than those of Italy and Paris, but some three centuries before the oldest of Germany, were originally divinity schools, or, at least, were conducted by divines and largely for sacred learning. In fact, theology was the chief and almost the sole science of that early day, and the only other forms of knowledge that took a scholastic form were languages and philosophy, both of which then had a decidedly theological aim and coloring. Moreover, the students were almost exclusively novitiates of some of the various monastic ranks with which at that time all parts of Europe particularly swarmed. Wycliffe himself, while in college, was a candidate for holy orders, and his own studies of course lay in that direction, as doubtless did those of most of his pupils.

2. The Lollards, as all the predecessors of Protestantism in England were called, had already begun a comparison of the glaring corruptions of Rome with the simple truths and practices of early Christianity, as well as with the obvious laws of morality and social decency; and in this discussion, which usually was rather indirectly than ostensibly carried on, the Bible, and especially the New Test., was of course continually appealed to as an authority against the papal dogmas, ecclesiastical traditions, and priestly dominations. These latter were especially open to the shafts of ridicule, and, as in the Reformation afterwards, the wits of Wycliffe's day, including Chaucer and Gower, were not slow in pointing out Romish inconsistencies to the public eye. The mass of the people were thoroughly awake to the religious questions thus raised, and every educated person who mingled freely with them, as Wycliffe did, had constant occasion to ascertain their feelings and apprehend their necessities.

3. The political condition of the country at the time greatly stimulated these debates, which had not yet been nationally agitated elsewhere. One century before Wycliffe was born, the English barons had extorted from the violent and vacillating king John the famous Magna Charta, which, although quickly denied by that prince, and denounced by the pope, who claimed the vassalage of the realm, yet, renewed by the next and confirmed by the subsequent sovereign, has remained to this day the substantial basis and bulwark of British constitutional liberty. From that document definitely dates the great struggle between the Romish and the secular arm, on the one side, and the aristocratic and the popular rights, on the other, which has characterized English as well as Continental history ever since. The reign of Henry III, who followed John upon the throne of England, was but a series of contests between the king and the newly instituted House of Commons; which after a lull during the reign of Edward I, who was the next prince, but who was chiefly occupied in settling the Scottish succession, broke out afresh under Edward II, and culminated in his dethronement and horrid death. All these fluctuations of civil power the Roman pontiff watched at a safe distance, like a vulture snuffing the field of battle, ever ready to pounce upon the weak or the wounded of either side. Edward III, who came to the throne at the age of fourteen, three years after the above-assumed date of Wycliffe's birth, soon engaged in wars with Scotland and France, which occupied his entire reign; but he nevertheless resisted the claims of Rome, and Parliament supported him by statutes declaring the independence of the English clergy. The effect of all these political turmoils was to create and foster a spirit of free inquiry into human rights, both civil and ecclesiastical. The seeds of the English Reformation of a later age were widely and deeply sown by these public measures and private experiences.

4. It must be borne in mind, however, that the art of printing had not yet been discovered. All books, being in MS., had to be laboriously copied by hand, and were therefore rare and costly. This was especially true of the Bible, from its large size and the dead languages in which it was written. The Latin Vulgate was the authorized, or rather, as we shall presently see, the only accessible form; and this the common people, of course, could not understand, nor even read. Hence Wycliffe, in his familiar intercourse with the populace, for which, as we shall see, his earliest public appearance was distinguished, must have orally translated for their benefit such passages of Scripture as he had occasion to cite in their hearing. The inconvenience and indirectness of this process seem to have induced in him the determination from his very college days to furnish a more adequate text than then existed for popular religious instruction. This purpose his whole career afterwards confirmed.

The only professed or real versions of any part of the Bible in English proper before Wycliffe's were those of the Psalms, made nearly simultaneously by William of Shoreham and Richard Rolle in the early part of Wycliffe's century. They were both made from the Latin, were exceedingly crude, fragmentary, and encumbered with notes in most copies, and never had any great celebrity or circulation. The earlier efforts at translation in English were mere poetical paraphrases of portions of Scripture, such as the Ormulum, a versification of the narrative of the Gospels and Acts, belonging probably to the former part of the preceding century; the Biblical poem entitled Soulhele, dating about the same period; a rhymed rehearsal of the principal events of Genesis and Exodus of a somewhat later date; and apparently contemporaneous with the last named, a metrical version of the Psalms, which existed with many variations in different MSS. The Anglo-Saxon versions that had preceded—namely, Cædmon's historical poem in the 7th century, Aldhelm's and Guthlac's Psalter of about the same date, "the Venerable" Bede's Gospel of John in A.D. 735, Aldred's "Durham Book," and Owen and Farnen's "Rushworth Gloss," about the middle of the 10th century; Elfric's abstracts from the historical books and Job a little later; besides king Alfred's attempts and a few other imperfect glosses on the Psalms, Proverbs, Canticles, etc.—were altogether sporadic; moreover, their language was quite unintelligible to Wycliffe's generation. The Anglo-Norman dialect which intervened was partially represented by a series of versions, or rather revisions, of these scattered elements, covering probably most of the Bible, and certainly the Gospels, the Psalter, the Canticles, and the historical books of the Old Test.; but these were of a mongrel character, and scarcely attained the authority or currency even of the Anglo-Saxon relics. There was an obvious and urgent need of a new and truly English version adapted to the actual condition and vernacular of the people.

II. Life.—Wycliffe's name (spelled also Wiclif, De Wyklef, etc.) is thought by Vaughan (John de Wycliffe, [1853], p. 4) to have been originally Wye-cliffe, i. e. Watercliffe, referring to a rocky hill on the banks of the Tees, about eleven miles north of the city of Richmond, in Yorkshire, where the family mansion was located. The estate has since passed into the possession of the Roman Catholic families of the Tonstalls and Constables; but the parish church adjoining is still known by the old name of Wycliffe. Of the Reformer's immediate parentage and early education nothing is recorded, nor is the exact date of his birth known. From the fact that he entered while yet a youth as one of the first commoners of Queen's College, Oxford, which was founded in 1340, he is generally believed to have been born in 1324. Somewhat later he became a probationer, and apparently also a fellow, of Merton College, and at the period of his first introduction to notice he was associated with some of the best scholars of the university, Chaucer being said to have been at one time his pupil. His hours were doubtless chiefly occupied, like those of an English college tutor of the present day, with private instruction to the undergraduates; and his intervals of recreation appear to have been largely spent in social rambles among the peasantry in the neighborhood. His scholastic culture, warmed by a genial temper, gave him great influence as well as ready access in thus acting the rare function of a link between the literary aristocracy and the sturdy populace of a collegiate borough. Hence he was enabled to sympathize with the wants and sentiments of the lower classes, and to meet them with the higher qualifications and views of a Christian student. In person considerably above the medium height, straight, slender, but wiry, with features indicating penetration and refinement, a thin aquiline nose, firm mouth, smooth forehead, and clear though somewhat deep-set eyes; his expression at once frank and cautious, bland but well-bred, intellectual and yet sympathetic, Wycliffe was a man to rivet attention and secure respect at the first glance.

In 1360 Wycliffe became known as a public opponent of the mendicant friars who infested England, interfering with the school discipline as well as with domestic relations; and to this date his tracts on that subject are accordingly assigned. This was an effort in behalf no less of the people, who were weary with the obtrusive sanctimony and beggarly squalor of these church fleas, than of the university authorities, who were equally sick of their impertinent ignorance and proselyting usurpation. It won him such popularity that in 1361 he was made warden (or master) of Balliol Hall (afterwards Balliol College), an office for which he was well qualified by his eminent diligence and reputation as a student of civil and canon law, and especially by his skill in philosophical and theological dialectics. This preferment gave both a wider scope to his scholastic abilities, and greater prestige to his popular discussions. In the same year he was made rector of Fillingham, in Lincolnshire, a position which he exchanged in 1368 for that of Ludgershall in the same diocese. These livings did not require his removal from Oxford, yet afforded him a clerical function and a pastoral opportunity to come still more closely than before into communion with the common people, and that in a rustic neighborhood.

In 1365 archbishop Islip of Canterbury appointed Wycliffe master of his new college of Canterbury Hall (afterwards merged in that of Christ Church) at Oxford, but soon after the accession of Langham to the see in 1366 the monks, who formed a majority of the members of the college, induced that prelate to eject Wycliffe, on the ground of some informality in the appointment, and the pope (Urban V) being appealed to, sided of course against Wycliffe by a special bull issued in 1370, of which the monks purchased the royal confirmation in 1372. How little heed Wycliffe, although still professing to be a faithful son of the Romish Church, paid to the papal order of silence accompanying the bull—since it was not only gratuitous, but illegal under the Parliamentary statutes above mentioned—we may judge from his tract in defence of the national policy against the pope, published about this time. This production doubtless contains the substance of his argument before the court, in reply to the same pontiff's summons to the king to pay the homage due from the time of John to the see of Rome—a demand which, as we have seen, Edward had refused to acknowledge, and now openly resisted. Thus introduced to the royal favor, Wycliffe acted as the king's chaplain, and was presented (Nov. 6, 1375) to the prebend of Aust, in the diocese of Worcester; and through the duke of Lancaster he was compensated (about 1376) for the loss of his college mastership by being made rector of Lutterworth where he had full scope for the reformatory principles which he now began to avow more pointedly. He had already (in 1372) been created "doctor in theology" by the University of Oxford, then not a mere honorary title, but an official one, authorizing him to lecture publicly before the students; and he used the privilege to expose the venality and superstitions of the monkish orders with a vigor of reasoning and a keenness of satire which are conspicuous in his published tracts on the subject. These abuses had come to be such a public burden, especially the occupancy of benefices by aliens, that in 1373 the king appointed a commission, and next year renewed it, with Wycliffe as a prominent member, to confer with the papal authorities for the abrogation of the evil. An arrangement was finally made, but the pope soon violated the compact, and Parliament again took action against the Roman usurpations. These developments more fully opened Wycliffe's eyes to the intolerant corruption of the Romish see, and he henceforth began to argue and preach, and teach and write, boldly and without reserve. As with Luther in a later age, the hierarchy was alarmed and exasperated; by a formal convocation they summoned him to answer, Feb. 19, 1377 (Lewis erroneously says 1378), to accusations of erroneous doctrine. The trial opened regularly in St. Paul's on the day appointed; but an unfortunate altercation of a personal nature, arising between the bishop of London and the duke of Lancaster, threw the assembly into an uproar, and even led to a popular tumult outside. In the mêlée, Wycliffe was carried off in safety by his friends. The pope (Gregory XI) was now induced to take up the matter. Formal articles were prepared against Wycliffe, and in five papal bulls, three of them dated simultaneously (May 22, 1377), he was cited to answer to the charges of insubordination and heresy. Before these summonses arrived, Edward III died, and Richard II was crowned; and the new Parliament was slow to surrender Wycliffe for a trial at Rome, or even to suffer his imprisonment at home. However, in February of the following year (1378), the archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of London, to whom one or more of the bulls had been addressed, ordered a second trial, which was accordingly held in Lambeth Palace in April. Wycliffe responded by a formal paper; but the proceedings were again abruptly, although not violently, ended by the interference of the populace in mass and the command of the king's mother; the prelatial judges retired in confusion with a pusillanimous injunction of silence upon Wycliffe, to which, of course, he paid no respect. The prosecution shortly expired with the death of Gregory, and a schism occurred by the election of two popes as his rival successors. This gave Wycliffe fresh opportunity of exposing the corruption of the papacy, and, at the same time, a season of quiet for the prosecution of his cherished design of translating the Scriptures, somewhat like that of Luther at the castle in the heart of the Thuringian Forest.

We rapidly pass over the residue of Wycliffe's life. Early in 1379 he had a severe fit of sickness, during which he was visited by the papal emissaries, who urged him to recant; but he soon recovered to denounce them more vigorously than ever. In 1382 a court constituted by the pope, with the aid of the new archbishop of Canterbury, controverted certain propositions of Wycliffe, who had begun to question the doctrine of transubstantiation; and as his patron, the duke of Lancaster, withheld his support, now that the Reformer ventured upon doctrinal ground, Wycliffe's position was eventually condemned, and the king was induced to remove him from the university. It is probable that the odium of Wat Tyler's insurrection in 1381 fell upon Wycliffe, as it was supposed by his enemies to have been fomented by the "poor priests," whom he sent out as itinerants to propagate his own views. The Wycliffites, as his numerous followers were called, were subjected to much persecution; but Wycliffe himself continued, unmolested, to preach at Lutterworth. On Dec. 29, 1384, he was seized with a second fit of paralysis, while (as some say) in the act of celebrating the Lord's supper, and died on the last day of that year. The Council of Constance (May 5, 1415) condemned his doctrines, and in 1428 his remains were dug up and burned; the ashes were cast into the adjoining Swift, which, as Fuller prosaically, and Wordsworth poetically, remark, conveyed them through the Avon and the Severn into the sea, and thus disseminated them over the world. His doctrines, carried into Bohemia by the members of queen Anne's retinue, originated the Hussite movement. The celibacy of the clergy being then a universal custom, Wycliffe died unmarried; his flock was his family, and the English Bible his heirloom to posterity.

III. Writings.—Wycliffe's literary productions are very numerous (Shirley [List of the Original Works of John Wycliffe (Oxf. 1865)] enumerates more than two hundred, chiefly tracts, many of them still unpublished); some of them are in Latin, others in English, and nearly all are on the religious questions of the day. Many of them still remain in MS. The most important, by far, is his New Testament, which appears to have been published about 1378, and again in 1380; the first printed edition was by John Lewis (Lond. 1731, fol.), the next by Henry H. Baber (ibid. 1810, 4to), and the latest at the Clarendon Press (Oxf. 1879, 12mo); it is also contained in Bagster's Hexapla (ibid. 1841, 4to), and, in part, in Bosworth's Anglo-Saxon Gospels (ibid. 1868, 8vo). It was likewise printed from a considerably different MS. by Pickering (ibid. 1848, 4to). Wycliffe also translated, either in person or by assistants, the entire Old Testament, including the Apocrypha, which seems to have been completed shortly before his death. His whole Bible has been accurately printed from a collection of 170 MSS., with valuable dissertations, etc., by Forshall and Madden (Oxf. 1850, 4 vols. 4to). Wycliffe translated directly from the Latin Vulgate, not deeming himself competent to use the Hebrew and Greek originals as a basis. His version is quite literal and plain, but stiff and Latinized; yet less so than many of Wycliffe's other writings. It has, of course, little critical value; but its influence, at the time, was immense, and has since been incalculable. It can hardly be considered the foundation of our present English Bible, but rather its precursor; and, no doubt, Tyndale largely used it in his translation from the original tongues. Wycliffe's Bible was revised about 1388 by John Purvey, who had been his curate; and it is Purvey's edition, rather than Wycliffe's own, that has generally passed as Wycliffe's Bible (so in Lewis's, Baber's, the Clarendon, and Bagster's text). Both are printed in parallel columns by Forshall and Madden. See AUTHORIZED VERSION.

Wylie, Andrew, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman and professor, was born at Washington in 1789. He was educated in the Presbyterian Church, and passed A.B. at Jefferson College, Canonsburgh, Pa., in 1810. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Ohio in 1812, and soon after installed pastor of Miller's Run Church. He was subsequently chosen president of Jefferson and Washington colleges, and extended his services as a preacher to Ten Mile and West Liberty, till his removal to Pigeon Creek, where his memory is still cherished. In 1828 he was elected president of Indiana College, and removed to Bloomington, where he joined the Episcopal Church. Twice he represented the diocese in General Convention, and was president of the Standing Committee in 1851. He died Nov. 11, 1851. Dr. Wylie was regarded as one of the ablest teachers in the West. He published an English Grammar (1822):—A Eulogy on Lafayette (1834):—a pamphlet entitled Sectarianism is Heresy, etc. (1840):—The Individual: a Baccalaureate (1851):—Sermons and Addresses:—a work on rhetoric:—and an Advice to Young Men (left ready for publication). Wylie, Samuel Brown, D.D., LL.D., a Reformed Presbyterian divine and author, was born at Moylagh, near Ballymena, County of Antrim, Ireland, May 21, 1778. He graduated at the University of Glasgow in 1797; emigrated to Philadelphia the same year; taught a school at Cheltenham, Pa., until the fall of 1798, when he was appointed a tutor in the University of Pennsylvania; was licensed to preach June 25, 1799; ordained June 25, 1800; was pastor of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, from 1801 to 1852; professor in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church from 1809 to 1851; professor of ancient languages in the University of Pennsylvania from 1828 to 1845, and emeritus professor from 1845 to 1852; vice-provost of the University of Pennsylvania from 1838 to 1845; and died in Philadelphia, Oct. 13, 1852. Mr. Wylie was the author of, The Faithful Witness for Magistracy and Ministry upon a Scriptural Basis (Phila. 1804; Paisley, Scotland, 1806; other eds.):—Covenanting (Greensburgh, Pa., 1803):—First Annual Address before the Religious Historical Society (Phila. 1818, 8vo):—Greek Grammar (1838, 8vo):—Life of the Rev. Alexander McLeod, D.D. (N. Y. 1855, 8vo), posthumous. He was co-editor of the Presbyterian Magazine (1821-22, 2 vols. 8vo), and also contributed to periodicals. "Few men have ranked higher than Dr. Wylie in classical literature and theological attainments, as a successful teacher, a good pastor, or a practical Christian" (Blake, Bing. Dict. s. v.). Wytembogard. See UYTENBOGAERT.

Wytenbach, Thomas, chronologically the first of Swiss reformers, is supposed to have been born in 1472 of an ancient family at Biel. He is known to have been a student at Tübingen, where Gabriel Biel and the learned Hebraist Konrad Pellican were the professors. About 1505 he habilitated himself at Basle as artium lib. magister and sanctæ theologiæ baccal. biblicus. He expounded the sentences of Peter Lombard and several books of Scripture, and taught the dogmas of Rome in disputations, as is attested by his pupils Leo Judah and Ulrich Zwingli. In 1507 he was appointed to the town church of Biel, and confirmed in that charge by the bishop of Lausanne on Aug. 26. In the course of his early ministry he was employed by the town authorities to conduct negotiations with Rome respecting the permission to use a milk diet in Lent and the obtaining of indulgences for the citizens of Biel. He was also zealous in defending the independence of the town priest against the abbot of the neighboring convent of St. John, and the rights of the town church against the civil authorities. In 1515 he sojourned at Basle, and obtained the degree of theological doctor, besides being made canon and custos of St. Vincent's, while retaining his previous office at Biel; but five years later he had resigned all his dignities at Basle and resumed his place at Biel altogether. He persistently preached against indulgences and the mass, kept a watchful eye upon the abbot of St. John and the town council, and ventured to attack the celibacy of priests. In 1524 he married, and was accordingly dismissed from his charge. He thereupon preached in the open air and other available places, visited his assailants and discussed the questions at issue with them, and by different methods gained many friends to his side. His life had been a constant struggle with poverty from the beginning, and was now more than ever wretched from this cause. But appeals to the council for support, in recognition of the services of eighteen years which he had given to the town, produced no effect; and when, in 1525, the temper of the community had changed, and resolutions were adopted by the citizens asking that Wytenbach be allowed to preach, and that a suitable support be assured him, the council first evaded the demand and then invoked the intervention of the bishop of Lausanne. An episcopal admonition was accordingly addressed to Biel, Nov. 11, 1525. A protracted agitation followed, the result of which was that Wytenbach was thrown aside by all parties, and refused employment of any kind by his native town. A pension amounting to twelve florins annually was after a time granted him as remuneration for the losses incurred in the contest with the abbot of St. John; but he did not live to enjoy even this beggarly provision. He died in 1526. Two years afterwards the reformation of Biel was an accomplished fact.

No literary remains of sufficient extent to afford a proof of Wytenbach's scholarly abilities are in existence. A few Letters, mostly contained in the archives of Biel, are extant, which show him to have been a man of convictions and a courageous defender of truth and right. Xavier, Francis, one of the most celebrated members of the Order of the Jesuits, was born of noble parentage at the Castle of Xavier, in Navarre, April 7, 1506. He was the youngest child of a large family, and fondly loved by his doting parents. Early developing remarkable talents, and devoted to literary pursuits, he was sent, at the age of eighteen, to the College of St. Barbara in Paris. The straitened circumstances of his parents threatened to cut short his course of study; but the affection of his eldest sister, and her almost prophetic insight into his wonderful future career, prompted to the practice of the strictest economy in home expenditures that this gifted brother might have the means to complete his collegiate education. It was not long before, as a public teacher of philosophy, he was able to procure the means for his own support and begin to make that impression in the world for which he afterwards became so renowned. It was at this time that he became acquainted with Ignatius Loyola, who threw around the brilliant young man the fascination which he was unable to resist, and in due time he was enrolled as a member of the Society of Jesuits. He followed his leader with an unquestioning obedience to Rome, and united with him in his effort to raise a band of devoted missionaries, who should go forth in all directions to extend the triumphs of the Church and bring the nations under the sway of the Christian faith.

After the discoveries of Vasco de Gama, the Portuguese had sent out colonies to India. By them the city of Goa was founded. Acting in accordance with the spirit of the age, John III., king of Portugal, resolved to set up the Christian Church in his Eastern territories, and by the suggestion of Loyola and of his own envoy at Rome, Gouvea, he selected Xavier to commence the enterprise. "A happier selection could not have been made, nor was a summons to toil, to suffering, and to death ever so joyously received." He embarked in a ship which bore a regiment of a thousand men, sent out to reinforce the garrison of Goa. A long, dismal, sickly, and in many instances deadly, voyage was the fearful experience through which they were destined to pass. Xavier, although himself weakened by constant sea-sickness, was an angel of mercy and kindness to his fellow-voyagers, and "lived among the dying and the profligate the unwearied minister of consolation and peace." Five months were passed in this dreary voyage when the ship reached Mozambique. Here Xavier was brought to the borders of the grave by a raging fever, and so slow was the return of his strength that it was months before he set foot in the city of Goa. A dismal moral scene met his eye, and a less heroic spirit would have been appalled in view of the mighty task he had undertaken to perform. But with apostolic zeal he commenced and prosecuted his work. Wearing the coarsest garments, and pale and haggard with his long sickness, he traversed the gay streets of Goa, swinging a large bell in his hand, and calling everywhere upon the parents whom he met to place their children under his spiritual care. Gathering these little ones under his tuition, he taught them the rudiments of religion, and sent them to their homes to carry to their parents the lessons which they had been taught by the missionary of the Cross. The wretched and the diseased were not forgotten by him. He frequented the most loathsome hospitals, and had words of sympathy and kindness for the suffering ones whom he found there. More than a year did he remain in Goa; and when his work there was done, the city was not what it was when first he took up his abode within its walls.

On the coast of Malabar there was then, as there is now, a pearl-fishery. Those engaged in this dangerous business formed a low and degraded caste, which seemed to be forsaken of God and man. Thither Xavier directed his steps. Once more were heard the tones of his ringing bell calling the rude, neglected children to his side and giving them such religious instruction as he had to impart. He prepared for them a catechism, from which they could learn the elements of Christian doctrine. He remained among these degraded pearl-fishers for fifteen months, sharing in all the hardships of their abject lot, and living among them in the humblest and most self-sacrificing way, if by any means he might win them to the acceptance of the faith which he taught. He found inexpressible joy in his missionary work. "I have nothing to add," thus he wrote to Loyola, "but that they who came forth to labor for the salvation of idolaters receive from on high such consolations that, if there be on earth such a thing as happiness, it is theirs."

His mission on the coast of Malabar accomplished, Xavier moved on to make other conquests for the Church. The kingdom of Travancore was next entered, and the most marvellous success followed his labors. He tells us that in one month he baptized ten thousand natives. With a zeal and energy not surpassed by any missionary of the Cross, he explored the islands of Mora, Maney, Ceylon, the Moluccas, and every part of the Indies which had been made known to the world by European travellers. "Weak and frail he may have been, but from the days of Paul of Tarsus to our own the annals of mankind exhibit no other example of a soul borne on so triumphantly through distress and danger in all their most appalling aspects." In 1549 he landed on the shores of Japan, and was soon able to preach to the natives of that great island the Gospel as he believed it. The story of the labors of Xavier and his associates among the Japanese is one of the most marvellous in the annals of missionary adventures. The details of this story are too long to be recited in a sketch like this, and the reader must look elsewhere to find them. With his ambition as a missionary still ungratified, and resolved to find a still larger field within which to operate, he turned his eye towards the great empire of China, and resolved to make that vast country the scene of his consecrated toil. Overcoming obstacles which would have terrified any other man, he embarked in the "Holy Cross," and at length reached Saucian, an island near the mouth of the Canton River, where the Portuguese had a commercial factory. Here he was prostrated by a disease which proved fatal. His iron frame was worn out by his ten years and a half of incessant work, and he was compelled to bow before a Power whose mandate he could not withstand. He died Dec. 2, 1552. His last words were, "In te, Domine, speravi; non confundar in aeternum" ("In thee, O Lord, have I put my trust; let me never be confounded"). His body was removed to Goa, where it was deposited in the Church of St. Paul. In 1619 he was beatified, and in 1622 was canonized as a saint. The "festive day" of Xavier in the calendar of the Romish Church is Dec. 3. See Stephens, Miscellanies, s. v. "Ignatius Loyola and his Associates;" The Life and Letters of St. Francis Xavier (London, 1872, 2 vols.); Christian Review, June, 1842. [J. C. S.]

Ximenes, FRANCISCO DE CISNEROS, cardinal-archbishop, grand-inquisitor of Castile, and regent of Spain, was descended from a family belonging to the inferior nobility of Castile, and originally resident in the town from which its appellation was derived. He was born in 1436, and named Gonzales, the name Francisco being a later monastic substitute. Early destined for the Church, he studied ancient languages at Alcalá, at the age of fourteen entered the University of Salamanca, and six years later became bachelor of both civil and canon law. He was driven by poverty to engage in the practice of law at Rome. On the death of his father, however, he returned home, having in the meantime obtained a papal brief assuring to him the first benefice which might become vacant in the archdiocese of Toledo; but the archbishop took offence at the interference of the pope in the affairs of his see, and had, besides, another candidate for the benefice. He accordingly imprisoned Ximenes to compel a renunciation of his claim, and did not liberate him until after six years. In 1480 a chaplaincy was obtained which removed him from under the jurisdiction of the archbishop and afforded him opportunity for the study of theology and also of the Hebrew and Chaldean languages; and soon afterwards he became vicar to Mendoza, bishop of Sigüenza, and administrator of the estates of Court-fiscales, who was a captive among the Moors. His fortunes seemed to be assured for life when he suddenly renounced all his emoluments and entered himself in the order of Franciscan Observants at Toledo as a novice, and devoted himself to ascetical practices excelling in rigor the harsh requirements of the monastic rule. Ere long he had won extraordinary fame as a preacher and confessor, and multitudes thronged to his confessional; but he turned away from these brilliant prospects also, and buried himself in the hermitage of the Madonna of Castanar in a hut erected with his own hands. Three years afterwards he was ordered by his superiors to the monastery of Salzeda, where he soon became guardian, and stimulated the monks by his example to strict performance of their vows.

In 1492 he was made confessor to the queen, Isabella, but with the proviso, insisted on by himself, that he should be allowed to fulfil his monastic obligations and reside in his convent. Two years later he was chosen to be provincial of his order for Castile, and after a visitation of the convents made on foot, in which he noted the lax discipline everywhere prevailing, he induced the queen to procure a brief from pope Alexander VI directing a reformation. In 1495 the archbishop of Toledo died, and Ximenes was promoted to his post, an appointment from which he vainly sought to escape by flight, and which had no effect whatever over his ascetical habits after it was accepted. He was ultimately ordered from Rome, under date of Dec. 15, 1495, to live in a style commensurate with his rank; but, though he obeyed in outward appearance, he persisted in wearing the coarse gown and cord of St. Francis and in sleeping on a bench by the side of his luxurious bed. In the influential position he now held, he was able to prosecute the reformation among the monks and secular clergy more energetically, and to compel its success despite the violent opposition raised against it. He caused Albornoz, a delegate to Rome who was to accuse him to the pope, to be arrested by the Spanish ambassador at Ostia and returned as a prisoner of state. Several thousand Franciscans are said to have sought relief from his rigorous rule in other lands. The general of the order visited Castile and complained bitterly, but to no purpose, against Ximenes. After his return to Rome, he caused the appointment of a number of coadjutors to share with Ximenes in the work of reform; but the latter paid no attention to this commission, and was even able, through the influence of the queen, to evade a papal bull, dated Nov. 9, 1496, which prohibited their Catholic majesties from proceeding with the reform until its operation had been investigated by the curia.

A like spirit of unfaltering sternness was exhibited by Ximenes in connection with the conversion of the Moors. Talavera, archbishop of Granada, was distinguished for liberality of view and for zealous interest in the peaceful conversion of the Moors; but Ximenes, acting as the leader of the fanatical party, insisted upon more energetic measures. He attempted, indeed, at first to convince the Moorish scholars by way of argument and also by donations, and so successfully that he was able to baptize three thousand Saracens on a single occasion; but when he encountered opposition, his violent spirit asserted itself. He disregarded all pledges, burned all Arabic books he could seize, though he saved three hundred medical works for his University of Alcalá, and irritated the Mohammedans beyond endurance and until they rebelled. Talavera and others persuaded them to lay down their arms; but the revolt was punished, nevertheless, by a revocation of all pledges previously given them, and by compelling them to choose between conversion or banishment. About fifty thousand Moslems submitted to baptism on these terms, and all the land was astonished at the ability with which Ximenes had been able to convert a hostile people to Christianity in so short a time. The character of the conversions will appear most clearly in the light of the fact that Ximenes rabidly opposed the publication of even fragmentary portions of the Scriptures or of expositions of the mass in the Moorish language. He insisted that the Scriptures should be preserved within the three languages in which, by the order of God, the inscriptions at the head of Christ's cross were written, urging that the common people despise what they understand, but venerate what is hidden from them and beyond their reach, and that wicked persons would bring the Catholic Church low whenever the Bible should be spread among the people in a form intelligible to them.

In other respects the work of Ximenes was often beneficial to the world, e. g. when he protected the poor and discharged unworthy officials, and when he remodelled the financial system of Castile, whose grand-chancellor he was, so that taxation became at once more tolerable to the subject and more remunerative to the State. He was the faithful spiritual adviser of the queen while she lived, and after her death secured to Ferdinand the government of Castile, a favor which was rewarded by the bestowal upon him of a cardinal's hat and of the post of general-inquisitor (1507). He had already begun the erection of buildings for the University of Alcalá in 1498, which were completed ten years later, and had given to it a faculty of forty-two professors, the ablest men to be found, and set apart fourteen thousand ducats for its annual support. His greatest literary undertaking was the Complutensian Polyglot, begun in 1502 by the accumulation of available manuscripts. The Old-Test. portion of the materials upon which that work was based have recently been transferred to the University of Madrid (see Tregelles, Accout [1854], p. 12-18). The Polyglot (in 6 vols.) was finished in 1517. See POLYGLOT BIBLES. Ximenes was also engaged in the preparation of an edition of the works of Aristotle, which was interrupted by his death, and he labored for the preservation of the Mozarabic liturgy.

Ximenes was not possessed of uncommon learning, and his instincts were rather those of a soldier than a scholar. He wished to renew the Crusades, and actually did bring about the capture of the piratical harbor of Mozarquivir and of the town of Oran, being personally present at the storming of the latter place. He has been credited with having originated the Inquisition in Castile, and charged, on the other hand, with having opposed its rule. Both statements are, however, erroneous. He came to the court twelve years after the Inquisition was introduced, and he protected Talavera, archbishop of Granada, against the charge of heresy by appealing the case from the Inquisition to the pope. As grand-inquisitor he issued instructions to enable new converts to protect themselves against the suspicion of relapse, and even provided for their education in Christian knowledge. He also restricted the authority of subordinate inquisitors. On the other hand, he refused to allow causes before the tribunal of the Inquisition to be tried in public, and in general showed himself to be in thorough harmony with the spirit of that institution. A moderate estimate fixes the number of persons burned at the stake during the ten years of his supreme administration at above two thousand. He also erected a new tribunal of the Inquisition and transplanted the Inquisition itself to Oran, the Canary Isles, and America.

He was unable to attend the Lateran Synod held under Leo X, but counselled the pope by letter, and promulgated the decisions of the synod before its members had dispersed. He also endorsed Leo's plan for improving the Julian calendar. But he did not, on the other hand, hesitate to condemn the sale of indulgences as involving an enervation of the discipline of the Church and a dangerous liberality. When king Ferdinand died (1516), Ximenes was made regent of Castile until Charles (V) should reach his majority, a position which he filled during twenty months with great ability. He preserved for the crown, against the opposition of the nobility, the grand-mastership of the order of San Iago di Compostella; transferred the seat of government to Madrid; had Charles proclaimed king over the votes of the assembled council; restrained the nobles by organizing an armed militia throughout all Spain, and deprived them of a portion of the property they had acquired by violence or fraud. With this money he paid all debts incurred by Ferdinand and Isabella, strengthened the army and navy, erected fortifications and established arsenals, and supplied the mercenary greed of the court with funds. He took measures to improve the condition of the natives of America, and appointed Las Casas to be protector over the American colonies. The introduction of African slavery into the colonies, which was proposed by some, was positively forbidden by him. On the return of Charles to Spain, he found Ximenes dying. The end came Nov. 8, 1517.

The principal source for Ximenes' life is Gomez, De Reb. Gestis a Fr. Ximeno Cisneros . . . Libri Octo, in Rerum Hisp. Scriptores Aliquot (Frankf. 1581), vol. iii. Yates, Andrew, D.D., a (Dutch) Reformed minister, was born at Schenectady, N. Y., Jan. 10, 1772. He graduated with honor at Yale College in 1793; studied theology under Dr. John H. Livingston, and was licensed in 1796 by the Classis of New York. In 1797 he was made professor of Latin and Greek in Union College, and held this chair until 1801, when he became pastor of a Congregational Church in East Hartford, Conn.

After thirteen years of efficient service (from 1801 to 1814), he again accepted a professorship in Union College (mental and moral philosophy), which he held eleven years (from 1814 to 1825), and for eleven years more was the principal of a high-school at Chittanooga, N. Y. (to 1836). From that time until his death he devoted himself with untiring zeal and great usefulness to the assistance of no less than thirteen feeble churches. During his life as a teacher, he was constantly engaged in preaching wherever he was wanted. He was the chief instrument in founding a mission among the Indians at Mackinaw, about 1823. He organized a Church at Chittenango, and was its pastor while he had charge of the high-school. His death was the result of illness contracted in his missionary labors. His last effort was the establishment of a Mission Church among a poor people at Day, or Sacondaga, Schenectady Co., N. Y., of which his sister, an aged and benevolent lady, was the chief supporter. But ten days before its dedication, and on a Sabbath, Oct. 13, 1844, he died without a struggle. His epitaph is inscribed on the bell of the little church, which is only one of the many monuments of his apostolic spirit and toils. At East Hartford his pastorate was greatly blessed with revivals and constant ingatherings. There he began, and at Schenectady continued, to teach theology to young men, of whom thirty entered the ministry of Christ. Among these were president Wayland, of Brown University; Dr. Mark Tucker, of Wethersfield; and Dr. B. B. Wisner, of Boston. Dr. Yates was an accurate scholar, a thorough theologian, an effective evangelical preacher, an accomplished college professor and officer, a man of great public spirit and Christian enterprise. He was in the best sense a Christian gentleman, and "a good minister of Jesus Christ." His publications consisted of a few occasional Sermons and fugitive pieces. He preferred to let his active works speak for him, for he was not ambitious of distinction. "I allow myself to do nothing," said he, "for the purpose of being superior to my neighbors. Ambition is a bad motive; the Bible does not appeal to it." "The dew falls silently, nobody hears it, but the fields feel it. The attraction of gravitation makes no noise." So he lived and died, a happy Christian, and "a workman that needed not to be ashamed." Dr. Sprague has given an unusual space to his memory in his Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ix, 126-138; see also Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church, p. 275, 276. (W. J. R. T.)

Yates, John Austin, D.D., a (Dutch) Reformed minister, son of the preceding, was born at East Hartford, Conn., May 31, 1801. He graduated at Union College in 1821, and studied theology at the Seminary of the Reformed Church at New Brunswick, N. J., for two years, when he accepted a tutorship in his alma mater at Schenectady, N. Y. He was licensed to preach in 1824; continued as tutor until 1827, and was then made professor of Oriental literature in the same institution. To complete his preparations for this chair, he went to Europe, studied at the University of Berlin, visited Italy and other countries, and returned at the end of two years to his post (in 1829). He was never settled as a pastor, but supplied various churches in Schenectady, Albany, and elsewhere during his collegiate life of twenty years. He had, however, accepted a call to the First Reformed Church of Jersey City, and had informally begun his labors with enthusiasm and great popularity. He died very suddenly of Asiatic cholera, Aug. 26, 1849, while on a visit to Schenectady, and his funeral sermon was preached in his church in Jersey City on the evening that had been set apart for his installation. Dr. Yates was a highly accomplished man, attractive in manners, of genial spirit, and possessed of that magnetic power which is so irresistible in social and public life. He was a man of genius, literary and polished to a high degree, and an enchanting public speaker. His sermons, being prepared during his professional life, were written with great care, and often were the fruits of long previous study and repeated revision. His delivery was animated and graceful, with a subdued earnestness, and free from all stage effects or merely popular aims. He was as simple as a child, and singularly free from duplicity or suspicion. He passed through many trials, to some of which his natural temperament added new pang and complications. His students and friends loved him unto death with the most ardent affection, while those who opposed him in some of his difficulties were equally decided in their feelings. His sudden death found him at peace with God and ready for his change. He left no printed remains. (W. J. R. T.)

Yates, Richard, D.D., an English clergyman, was born at Bury St. Edmund's in 1769. He was chaplain of Chelsea Hospital from 1798, and rector of Ashen, in Essex, from 1804 until his death, Aug. 24, 1834. He published, An Illustration of the Monastic History and Antiquities of the Town and Abbey of St. Edmund's-Bury (1805):—The Church in Danger, etc. (1815):—and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Yates, William, D.D., a Baptist missionary, was born at Loughborough, Leicestershire, England, Dec. 15, 1792. He was educated at Bristol College, and went to Calcutta as a missionary in 1815. He settled at Serampore, where, after the death of Dr. Carey, he devoted himself entirely to translating, and to preparing textbooks. He visited England and the United States in 1827-29, and in 1845 embarked for England on account of his health, but died on the Red Sea, July 3 of that year. He translated the whole Bible into Bengalee; the New Test. and most of the Old into Sanscrit, and the New Test. into Hindee and Hindostanee. Among his most important publications were, A Grammar of the Sanscrit Language on a New Plan (1820):—Sanscrit Vocabulary (ed.):—Introduction to the Hindostanee Language (1827):—Dictionary, Hindostanee and English (1836):—Biblical Apparatus, in four parts (1837):—Theory of the Hebrew Verb:—and Introduction to the Bengalee Language (posthumous; edited by J. Wenger, 1847). A Memoir (1847) of him has been written by Dr. James Hoby. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Yeomans, John William, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Hinsdale, Mass., Jan. 7, 1800. He graduated at Williams College in 1824; studied theology in the seminary at Andover, and was ordained and installed pastor of the Church at North Adams in November, 1828. In 1832 he became pastor of the First Congregational Church of Pittsfield; in 1834 of the First Presbyterian Church of Trenton, N. J.; in 1841 accepted the presidency of Lafayette College, Easton, Pa.; and in 1845 became pastor of the Mahoning Church, Danville, where he continued to labor until his death, June 22, 1863. Dr. Yeomans was a man of strong and original mind. His profound thought and logical power were acknowledged by all who knew him or read his writings. As a preacher, he was instructive, impressive, and often highly eloquent. Above all, he was a man of faith and prayer, of deep, intelligent, and scriptural piety. He published, an Election Sermon (Boston, 1834, 8vo):—Dedication Sermon (1840, 8vo):—Inaugural Address (1841, 8vo):—and was co-author of a Hist. of the County of Berkshire, Mass. (Pittsfield, 1829, 12mo, 468 pp.; in 2 pts.). Besides these, he was a frequent contributor to the Biblical Repository and other religious periodicals, and had for several years been engaged in writing Commentaries on the Epistle to the Romans and the Gospel of John, both of which were left in an unfinished state. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 207; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (J. L. S.)

Young, Alexander, D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born in Boston, Sept. 22, 1800. In 1812 he entered Boston Latin School, and in 1820 he graduated at Harvard College. In 1821 he entered the Divinity School at Cambridge, where he pursued the regular course of study for three years. He was licensed in 1824, and accepted a call to the Sixth Congregational Church, Boston, in 1825. In 1833 he went to Europe. He was a very successful preacher. He died March 16, 1846. His publications were numerous, mostly sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 524.

Young, Arthur, D.D., LL.D., an English divine, chaplain to speaker Onslow, became rector of Bradfield, and in 1746 prebendary of Canterbury. He died in 1759. He published a Historical Dissertation on Idolatrous Corruptions in Religion, etc. (1734). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Young, Brigham, the president and prophet of the Mormons (q. v.), or Latter-day Saints, was born in Whitingham, Vt., June 1, 1801. He was the son of a farmer, received a very limited education, and learned the trade of a painter and glazier. He joined the Baptist Church and preached occasionally with considerable acceptance. In 1832, however, he joined the Mormons at Kirtland, O., became an elder and one of the twelve apostles, and was sent as a missionary in 1835 to make proselytes in the Eastern States, in which he was very successful. His preaching was characterized by a peculiar kind of eloquence, which made a deep impression, and enabled him to rise rapidly in the estimation of the people of his sect, and to acquire almost boundless influence. He possessed, at the same time, great energy and shrewdness and a strong personality, which further enhanced his popularity. After the death of Joseph Smith, in 1844, Young was one of the four aspirants to the presidency, and was unanimously elected to that office by the apostles. The choice was received with the highest approval, and his principal rival, Sidney Rigdon, was excommunicated. When the Mormons were expelled from Nauvoo in 1846, Young set out to lead the host on their weary journey across the Plains, which terminated only on their reaching Great Salt Lake Valley, which he declared to be the promised land. Here he founded Salt Lake City in July, 1847, in which he exercised absolute authority. In March, 1849, a convention was held in that city, a constitution framed, and a State was organized under the name of Deseret, which, in the "reformed Egyptian" language, is said to mean the "Land of the Honey-bee." Congress, however, refused to admit the new state, but Utah Territory was organized, and President Fillmore appointed Brigham Young governor for four years. The next year the United States judges were driven away; and at the termination of the four years for which Young had been appointed governor, Colonel Steptoe was appointed in his place. But on visiting Utah in 1854, he was resisted by the Mormon president, who declared that he would "be governor, and no power could hinder it until the Lord Almighty says, 'Brigham, you need not be governor any longer.'" In 1857 President Buchanan appointed Alfred Cumming governor, and sent him out with a military force of 2500 men for the protection of the Federal officers. This brought matters to a crisis, and the Mormons became peaceable, though not without some concessions on the part of the government.

On Aug. 29, 1852, Young proclaimed the "celestial law of marriage," sanctioning polygamy, which he declared had been revealed to Joseph Smith in July, 1843. This was denounced by Smith's widow and her four sons as a forgery; and, although the Mormon apostles had repeatedly and explicitly denied the imputation of such a doctrine and practice, they now accepted it without much resistance. He took to himself a large number of wives, most of whom resided in a building known as the "Lion House," so called from a huge lion, carved in stone, which stands upon the portico. In addition to his office of president of the Church, he was grand archee of the Order of Danites, a secret organization within the Church, which was one of the chief sources of his absolute power; and by organizing and directing the trade and industry of the community for his own advantage he accumulated immense wealth. During the later years of his life and administration, the development of the mining interests of the Territory and of the commercial interests of Salt Lake City brought a great many "gentiles" (as those who are not Mormons are called by that sect) to the Territory and city, and the temporal power of Brigham Young had greatly diminished. He died at Salt Lake City, Aug. 29, 1877.

Young, Edward (1), LL.D., an English clergyman, father of the poet, was born in 1643. He was successively fellow of Winchester College, rector of Upham in Hampshire, prebendary of Salisbury (1682), chaplain to William and Mary, and dean of Salisbury. He died in 1705. He published a number of single sermons, and a collection under the title of Sermons on Several Occasions (Lond. 1702-3, 2 vols.). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Young, Edward (2), a celebrated English poet and clergyman, was born at Upham in Hampshire, in 1684. He was educated at Winchester School and at Oxford University, where he received a law fellowship in All-Souls' College in 1708. He devoted himself, however, more to poetry and religious studies than to law; but received the degree of B.C.L. in 1714, and that of D.C.L. in 1719. His first appearance as a poet was in 1713, in an Epistle to George, Lord Lansdowne, on his being created a peer. He, however, became ashamed of its fulsome flattery and suppressed it. In the same year he also published two other poems of some length, entitled respectively The Last Day and The Force of Religion, or Vanquished Love. The year following he published A Poem on the Death of Queen Anne. These efforts gave him some immediate reputation, and in 1719 he ventured on the more ambitious effort of a tragedy, under the title of Busiris, which was brought out at Drury Lane with fair success. This attracted to him the notice of the duke of Wharton, with whom he went abroad at the end of this year. At the death of the duke, Young received an annuity of £200. In 1721 his tragedy The Revenge was produced, but was unsuccessful at the time, though it has since had greater acceptance. Between 1725 and 1728 appeared in succession his satires entitled The Love of Fame, the Universal Passion, which had great success, and brought to their author both money and fame. In 1726 he issued The Instalment, a poem addressed to Sir Robert Walpole on his being made a Knight of the Garter, for which service it is believed he obtained his pension. In 1727 he took holy orders, and was appointed one of the royal chaplains; and in 1730 he became rector of Welwyn, Hertfordshire, which post he retained, much against his will (for he was an anxious seeker for ecclesiastical preferment), until his death, April 12, 1765. In 1731 he married Lady Elizabeth Lee, daughter of the Earl of Lichfield and widow of Colonel Lee. He exhibited great grief at her death, in 1741; and it is believed that he received the suggestion of the Night Thoughts from the solemn meditations on that event. By this work, begun shortly afterwards and published 1742-46, almost solely is he remembered. He published numerous other works of no present importance. In 1762 he superintended an edition of his collected works in 4 vols. 12mo, from which he excluded some of his most gushing productions. The Night Thoughts has passed through editions innumerable both in England and America. Various other editions of his collected works have also appeared from time to time, for which see Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. See also Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Johnson, Lives of the Poets; Hazlitt, Lectures on the Eng. Poets, lect. vi.

Young, Jacob, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Allegheny County, Pa., March 19, 1776. His father was a member of the Church of England, and his mother was a Presbyterian, yet both were strangers to the converting power of Christ until brought to him by their own son. The stirring scenes and mighty struggles connected with the birth of our national republic at the time Mr. Young was ushered into life seem to have breathed into him the very spirit of greatness. His first years were passed amid the wildest scenes of frontier peril, which inspired him with physical and mental activity, and uncommon natural courage. Under the care of his affectionate mother, he grappled with many of those great thoughts which afterwards swelled his mature and manly heart. The simple grandeur of the New Test. impressed his mind, while the history and sufferings of his Saviour won his heart and kindled his most ardent love. In early manhood he moved with his father to Kentucky; joined the Methodists; felt himself called to preach, and, without formal Church authority, preached his first sermon, saw the congregation bathed in tears, and felt in his own soul the heavenly unction. In 1801 he was licensed to preach, and under the direction of William McKendree, afterwards bishop, was thrust out on a large frontier circuit. For fifty-five years Mr. Young was engaged in the itinerancy. He travelled extensively, everywhere attended by marvellous success. He died Sept. 16, 1859. He was a man of great intellectual power, habitually prompt, laborious, unswerving; great in his Christian character, great in his fidelity, great in his success. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 233; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.; and his Autobiography.

Young, John Clarke, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, son of the Rev. John Young, was born at Greencastle, Pa., Aug. 12, 1803. He prosecuted his preparatory studies under John Borland, an eminent teacher of New York city; and studied three years in Columbia College, when he removed to Dickinson College, graduating in 1823. He entered Princeton Theological Seminary in 1824, where he remained two years; then in 1826 became tutor in the College of New Jersey, where he served until 1828. He was licensed in the spring of 1827 by the Presbytery of New York; and, on leaving Princeton, was settled as pastor of the McChord Presbyterian Church of Lexington, Ky. In the fall of 1830 he was chosen president of Centre College, Danville, and filled the office with great credit to himself during the remainder of his life. In 1834 he assumed, in connection with the presidency of the college, the office of pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Danville, in which relation, also, he remained until his death, which occurred June 23, 1857. He published a number of single Sermons, Speeches, and Addresses. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iv, 44.

Young, John Kimball, D.D., a minister of the Congregational Church, was born at Dover, N. H., March 22, 1802. His preparatory studies were pursued at Dover Academy; he entered Dartmouth College at the age of fifteen, and graduated in 1821. He was a teacher in Dover Academy, and in Charleston, S. C., from January, 1824, to July, 1827; graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1829, and was ordained in Boston, Sept. 24, 1829; was the agent of the American Bible Society from 1829 to 1831; installed pastor at Laconia, N. H. (then Meredith Bridge), Nov. 29, 1831, and was dismissed Feb. 12, 1867. He was acting pastor at Hopkinton from 1867 to 1874. From 1842 he was a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; from 1846 to 1858, also from 1861 to 1873, he was a trustee of the New Hampshire Missionary Society; for a time was a trustee of the Gilmanton Academy and Theological Seminary; was corresponding secretary of the New Hampshire General Association from 1851 to 1861, was moderator of it in 1866, and from 1849 was a member of the New Hampshire Historical Society. He died at Laconia, Jan. 28, 1875. See Cong. Quar. 1876, p. 437; 1877, p. 576.

Young, John R., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Marlborough, N. Y., Oct. 17, 1820. He graduated at Union College, and subsequently at Union Theological Seminary. After his ordination he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Phelps, N. Y.; and subsequently he became stated supply of Painted Post, Baldwinsville, Cortland, and Keeseville, all in N. Y. A second pastorate in Plattsburg lasted five years; from Plattsburg he removed to Mamaroneck, and from thence to Newport, R. I. He was pastor at Greenbush, N. Y., for two years, and stated supply at Albany for two years following. After this he served a short time at Newark, N. Y., and at Tecumseh, Mich.; also at Clyde, where he was taken ill, and returned to Albany. He died at Norfolk, Va., July 30, 1879. See Necrological Report of Union Theological Seminary.

Young, Matthew, D.D., a distinguished Irish prelate and mathematician, was born in the County of Roscommon in 1750. He prosecuted his studies at Trinity College, Dublin, where he was admitted in 1766; became a fellow in 1775, and entered into holy orders. In 1786 he was chosen professor of natural philosophy in the same institution, and greatly enlarged his course of instruction, introducing illustrations by means of apparatus. He was one of the founders of the Royal Irish Academy, which began active work in 1782. He was appointed by lord Cornwallis bishop of Clonfert and Kilmachduagh; and died Nov. 28, 1800. He published a number of mathematical and philosophical papers and essays, and left in MS. a Latin Commentary on the First Two Books of Newton's Principia. See Knight, Engl. Cyclop. Biog. vi, 892; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Young, Patrick (Lat. Patricius Junius), a noted English clergyman and scholar, was born at Seton, in East Lothian, Scotland, Aug. 29, 1584. He was educated at the University of St. Andrews, where he took the degree of A.M. in 1603. In 1605 he was incorporated A.M. at Oxford, took deacon's orders, and became chaplain of New College. He went to London afterwards; was granted a pension of £50 a year; and made keeper of the library of king James. In 1617 he went to France and other neighboring countries, where he attracted great attention on account of his learning. He was subsequently presented to the rectories of Hayes and Llanrhian. In 1649 he retired to Bromfield, in Essex, where he lived with his son-in-law, Mr. Atwood; and died Sept. 7, 1652. His great scholarship is not adequately represented by his literary remains, for he is said to have been indolent and undesirous of literary fame. He assisted Thomas Reid in translating into Latin the works of king James; made some notes on the Alexandrine MS. of the Bible (extending down to Numb. xv), which are published in Walton's Polyglot Bible, vol. vi, under the title Patricii Junii Annotationes quas Paraverat ad MS. Alexandrinum, etc.;—published in 1639 an edition of the Epistles of Clemens Romanus, from the same MS., which may be found in vol. i of the Sacrosancta Concilia of Labbé and Cossart;—and in 1638 published an Exposition of Solomon's Song, written by Gilbert Foliot, bishop of London in the time of Henry II. His Life has been written by Sir Thomas Smith (rabbi Smith). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Knight, Engl. Cyclop. Biog. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Young Men's Christian Associations.

This is the current designation of certain organizations of modern times for religious work outside of the regular ecclesiastical limits.

I. History.—There were associations of young men for religious improvement in Great Britain and Ireland at a very early period. The meetings of college students participated in and largely controlled by John and Charles Wesley were of this character. Such organizations found their way into Germany and Switzerland about the same time. In 1710 there were similar societies in New England, which were addressed by Cotton Mather under the title of "Young Men Associated." There were similar associations in some of the German cities during the period from 1834 to 1842. Up to that time, however, the organizations were sporadic, and left no permanent results in the form of our present associations. A larger movement occurred in Germany in 1849, which resulted in the organization of the German associations of the present time.

The Young Men's Christian Associations of England and America originated in a meeting of a dozen clerks in the upper story of a London commercial house, for the purpose of spending an hour in religious exercises, in 1844. It was organized by George Williams, one of the clerks, and afterwards became enlarged in its scope and plan so as to meet the wants of the Christian young men of that vicinity. A convention of those who had become interested in the movement was held, and a society was formed on June 6, 1844, for "Improving the Spiritual Condition of Young Men in the Drapery and other Trades." The plan was imitated in other British cities, and found its way across the Channel. Various cities on the Continent attempted similar organizations, and among them Paris. In the French metropolis, however, the consent of the police was required in order to hold any kind of public meeting. This was at length given, and a start was made in the good work. A providential circumstance favored the popularization of the new movement. Just at this time Renan's Life of Jesus had appeared, and was producing great excitement among the Parisians. The work was read by thousands. To counteract the infidel influence of this brilliant writer, Protestant lectures were given in reply to him. The lectures were crowded. Thousands became eager listeners, who had hitherto been out of the reach of the churches and other religious movements. This gained for the association the esteem of all the better classes, and gave it a standing which it has ever since maintained.

The movement of London also found its way across the Atlantic in two directions at about the same time. The association of Montreal, Canada, was organized according to the model of the London society, Dec. 9, 1851. Twenty days later, by direct suggestion from London, and without knowledge of the organization at Montreal, the association of Boston, Mass., was organized. On June 30, 1852, the association of New York was organized, and during the same year ten associations, including those of Baltimore and Washington, came into existence. Cincinnati, however, claims a permanent organization since 1848, which is earlier than that of any other American association. Such organizations have greatly multiplied in North America since the time above mentioned, and at an early period of their history united in conventions for aggressive and concerted action. At the First Annual Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States and British Provinces, which met at Buffalo, N. Y., June 7 and 8, 1854, a number of the societies, about half of those in existence, formed a Confederation. There were at that time in the countries mentioned 35 societies with about 8000 members. Associations not formally connected with the Confederation were welcomed to seats in the annual meetings, but could have no part in the proceedings except by courtesy of the convention. A second convention was held at Cincinnati in September, 1855, when there were 60 associations with 9000 members. A third convention was held at Montreal in June, 1856, when the reports showed the existence of 67 societies with 10,000 members. This convention accepted and ratified the Paris basis, adopted by the first World's Conference of the associations, held in that city in 1855. It is as follows:

"The Young Men's Christian Associations seek to unite those young men who, regarding Jesus Christ as their God and Saviour, according to the Holy Scriptures, desire to be his disciples in their doctrine and in their life, and to associate their efforts for the extension of his kingdom among young men."

As a rule, the American associations regulated their membership on this basis. It was deemed advisable to keep their membership within the membership of the evangelical churches. While those outside who are seriously disposed are permitted to enjoy all the general advantages of the association, they are not allowed to vote or to hold office. In the English associations, as a general rule, any person is eligible to membership who gives evidence of his conversion to God. But still it is expected that when such a state exists, the young man will unite with some Church. In Holland there is no restriction as to membership; it is presumed that when a young man presents himself to the association, he is earnestly seeking the kingdom of God, and is worthy of all encouragement. From the period of its organization to the breaking-out of the civil war in 1861, the new movement had made steady and rapid progress, the membership of all the associations having reached 25,000 in April of the preceding year. The work done is in part indicated by an extract from the report of the annual convention held at New Orleans, April 11, 1860:

"Sixty-nine associations have sent in reports. Of these 64 have sustained prayer-meetings; 15 have Bible-classes; 34 conduct mission Sabbath-schools; 30 have had courses of sermons, and 35 courses of lectures; 49 own libraries, and 38 keep open reading-rooms."

But with the fall of Fort Sumter came a terrible shock to the associations. Many of them disbanded; the annual convention could not be called that spring; and the Confederation speedily fell to pieces. The work of the preceding ten years seemed to have been destroyed in a day. But a new field of activity came on with the war. Within a month after the opening of the war the association of New York appointed an Army Committee, who began work among the soldiers gathered in the numerous camps in the neighborhood of that city, and exposed to the demoralizing influences of camp and army life. Devotional meetings were held among the soldiers; a pocket edition of a Soldier's Hymn-book was published and circulated; the Christian men of every regiment were organized, as far as possible, for effective work, and public sentiment was aroused in behalf of the momentous interests involved.

The need of co-operation under this new phase of the movement, as under the earlier development, was soon felt, and, by the suggestion of the Army Committee of the New York association, the Central Committee was induced to call a convention to meet in New York. Only forty-two delegates were present, and these represented but fifteen associations; but in their sessions, which lasted a day and a half, a grand beginning was effected. In order to promote the temporal and spiritual welfare of the soldiers and sailors of the army and navy, the United States Christian Commission was appointed. This commission consisted of twelve Christian gentlemen, from eight leading cities, and was to be the organ and executive agent of the Young Men's Christian Associations and of the Christian public. This proved to be a great boon to the soldiers in camps, on battle-fields, and in hospitals. It co-operated with the Sanitary Commission, which was a purely secular agency; but it went further than that commission could go. The Christian public heartily supported its efforts, and made it the medium by which Christian homes, churches, and communities sent spiritual and material comfort to the soldiers in the field and the hospital. This work belonged distinctively to the Young Men's Christian Associations only at its origin. After it was fairly organized it belonged to the whole Christian public. During the four years of the war, the commission sent out 4859 delegates to do hospital and Gospel work; expended in cash $2,513,741.63; received and distributed stores worth $2,839,445.20; received and distributed Bibles and reading-matter valued at $299,576.26; distributed 1,466,748 Bibles and parts of the Bible, 296,816 bound books, 1,370,953 hymn-books, 19,621,103 papers and magazines, 9,308,052 knapsack-books in flexible covers, 39,104,243 pages of tracts; its delegates preached 58,308 sermons, and held 77,441 prayer-meetings.

Similar work was done by some of the associations in the South among the soldiers of the Confederate army, but there was no general organization for that purpose.

The distinctive work of the associations throughout the country during the war was continued on a limited scale. Two general conventions were held during this period; the first met at Chicago, June 4-7, 1863, with 30 associations represented; the second met at Boston, June 1-5, 1864, with 28 associations represented by 136 delegates. Although these meetings were full of enthusiasm, it appeared that the principal activity of the societies was absorbed in army and commission work.

After the close of the war the associations entered upon a new period of progress in their work among young men, which has continued at an increasing rate until the present, and has every appearance of a still greater development of power for good in the years to come. Among the items in which this improvement has been manifested, a few deserve mention. A number of general secretaries have been appointed, who make this work for young men the business of their lives. These secretaries hold an annual meeting for the interchange of views on their common work, and carefully prepared papers are read on topics of vital interest to those present. The greatest advantage accruing from the labors of these officers is the rapid increase of societies, as well as of workers in those already organized. There has been a rapid increase in the amount of property and the number of buildings owned by these associations. A test of membership has been adopted by the International Convention, which has secured a more substantial Christian character to the associations. In 1866, at Albany, N. Y., they reaffirmed the Paris basis adopted in 1856; in 1868, at Detroit, Mich., they adopted the "evangelical Church test;" and in 1869, at Portland, Me., defined the term evangelical. The test, as now applied, is as follows:

"Resolved, That, as these organizations bear the name of Christian, and profess to be engaged directly in the Saviour's service, so it is clearly their duty to maintain the control and management of all their affairs in the hands of those who profess to love and publicly avow their faith in Jesus, the Redeemer, as Divine, and who testify their faith by becoming and remaining members of churches held to be evangelical. And we hold those churches to be evangelical which, maintaining the Holy Scriptures to be the only infallible rule of faith and practice, do believe in the Lord Jesus Christ (the only-begotten of the Father, King of kings and Lord of lords, in whom dwelleth the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and who was made sin for us, though knowing no sin, bearing our sins in his own body on the tree), as the only name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved from everlasting punishment."

At the time this resolution was passed about one half of the associations had the same test. It was decided that all associations organized after that date must, in order to be entitled to representation in the International Convention, limit their active voting membership to members of evangelical churches. The associations have thus secured the hearty co-operation of the churches and Christian people of the land. Another important work, not to be overlooked, is the origination by these societies of stringent legislation in the United States for the suppression of obscene literature, and the continuation of those efforts by special organizations for the enforcement of such legislation.

The building of the Pacific Railroad brought together many men of vicious habits, who, in turn, contaminated those who came in contact with them. Here was a new population continually on the move, yet sadly needing the assistance of such an organization as the Young Men's Christian Association. Each new terminus of the road became, for the time being, a town, generally of tents and board shanties; but what was a town to-day might be a wilderness to-morrow, and another spot in the wilderness be chosen for the town. Churches could not keep pace with this onward march of humanity; and in July, 1868, the Young Men's Christian Association of Omaha organized a movement to meet the demands of this new field. They sent out a company of Christian young men whose duty it was to keep pace with the march of the employés and the attendant means of drawing men into temptation. They held religious meetings wherever they could get a hearing, and organized societies for the perpetuation of these beginnings. After the movement had been fairly started by the Omaha association, and its practicability had been demonstrated, the International Convention of the Young Men's Christian Association took it up, and extended it to other railroads as rapidly as circumstances would permit. Efforts were made to open rooms for railroad workmen at Erie, Altoona, Baltimore, Jersey City, and other important centres, but for various reasons they met with only partial success. In time leading railroad men became interested in these philanthropic labors in behalf of their employés. Such men as Cornelius Vanderbilt, Thomas A. Scott, John W. Garrett, Robert Harris, J. H. Devereux, and others gave encouragement to the movement in various ways. Some of them contributed to the support of secretaries named by the associations, and offered rooms for the holding of meetings. In Indianapolis twelve railway companies unite in supporting the association; and in Chicago the principal railroad officials are members of association committees.

II. Present Operations.—There are two prominent characteristics of these associations, which deserve notice: they are associations of young men; they embody the youthful enthusiasm and energies of the Church. What constitutes a young man, is a problem that has had various solutions. In America a man is considered to have passed his youth when he has reached the age of forty years. After that he ceases to be an active, and becomes a counselling, member. In France marriage serves as the dividing line between the young men and those who have passed young manhood. Young women, as a rule, are not admitted. In one or two organizations women have been admitted to equal or nearly equal privileges with men. This is the case in Brooklyn, where the wisdom of the plan is apparent in the activity and efficiency of the society. In some other cities women have all the privileges of the library and reading-room, and other similar advantages. In Boston they have organized a Young Women's Christian Association. A like association was founded in New York in 1870, and incorporated in 1873. It has for its object the same ends as those to which Young Men's Christian Associations are directed. Generally, however, young women are not admitted to these organizations of young men, except as spectators to certain of the more public meetings.

The second characteristic of these associations is their undenominational character. They profess to be simply Christian associations. But it was found necessary to limit the voting membership to Christian young men, and in time it was deemed important to find a common basis of Christian belief. This was found in the evangelical test already mentioned. There is a broad distinction to be noted in the methods and opinions of the evangelical churches and the so-called liberal Christians. The incitements to sinners to lead a new life, the degree of zeal in exhortation, and the methods of instructing inquiring penitents are so widely different in the two systems of belief that it was considered vital to the success of the enterprise to keep them separate in this field of labor. No new creed was desired, and none was needed; a simple declaration of what was already in the symbols of all evangelical churches was sufficient to unite the Christian young men of America into one brotherhood for aggressive Christian work. There is no clashing of theological opinions, for all have united under the one banner of the Divine Christ, to reach out and save fallen humanity from impending ruin.

The work of the associations consists of prayer-meetings, Bible classes, social meetings, educational classes, meetings in jails, hospitals and almshouses, open-air services, services of song, neighborhood and cottage prayer-meetings, and the sustaining of reading-rooms, lectures, gymnasiums for physical exercise, and employment bureaus. The extent of this work is indicated in the statistics given at the close of this article.

The great work and rapid growth already indicated, and still more apparent by an examination of the statistics, could not have been secured by the active efforts of individual associations. A very common experience is that of a few young men of a village, who meet and organize an association, obtain a room, meet for a few months, and then disband. Such failures result from a lack of organized superintendence. To counteract such evils, secretaries were employed, who were to give their time to the work and receive remunerative salaries. In 1870 these were 11 in number; while in 1880 there were 133 secretaries, with several assistants.

The system of organization and mutual dependence of these associations is best indicated by an extract from an article by Rev. George R. Crooks, D.D., in Harper's Weekly for April 3, 1880. He says:

"First are the local organizations, occupying hired rooms, or in some instances their own buildings, and employing secretaries to conduct the necessary business. Then follow the state and provincial organizations, composed of a State or Canadian province, holding an annual convention and appointing a State committee to exercise due oversight. Their relation to the local bodies, however, is purely advisory; twelve of them employ secretaries. Ascending higher, we have the American International organization, composed of the associations of the United States and Canada. Its executive agent is an International Committee of twenty-five members, having a working quorum in New York city. The committee is a vigorous body, and has taken in hand the fostering of associations among college students, commercial travelers, Germans, colored young men, and railroad men. At the top of all is the International Central Committee, which met in Geneva, Switzerland, in June, 1879."

The work accomplished by the American International organization has exerted a powerful influence upon the associations of the whole country. In 1866 a committee of five was appointed by the convention, and located in New York. This committee has since retained its headquarters, with a working quorum, in that city, but has been increased to twenty-five members, many of whom reside in other parts of the country. This is the executive agent of the International Convention. By it the convention is called to assemble each year, and by it the proceedings are afterwards published. Each year the committee brings up a report of its work, and submits a plan for the coming year. This, after due consideration and such modifications as are considered desirable, is referred back to the committee for execution. In 1868 the convention authorized the employment of a visitor in the West. The field included the states of Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Kentucky, and Tennessee. There he has continued to labor with abundant success. When he began his labors there were less than 40 associations, maintained at an annual expense of $29,000. Now there are nearly 300 associations, expending annually more than $100,000. At that time only one general secretary was employed, and not one society owned a building. Now there are 48 general secretaries and eight buildings. The eleven states all have state organizations, and of these six employ state secretaries.

The requirements of the central office had so increased in 1870 that a general secretary of the International Committee was appointed to direct the correspondence, visitation, and editorial work. He has since been retained, and, owing to the increased demands of this department, an assistant has lately been provided.

The work in the South has developed wonderfully within a period of ten years. In 1870 there were between Virginia and Texas only three associations. In that year the visitors of the committee began their labors in that section, and now there are more than 150 associations.

The work among railroad men has already been referred to. Another movement, entirely independent of the Pacific Railroad Mission, was that begun in Cleveland, O., in 1872. In that city, where about 10,000 men are employed by railroad companies, meetings were held to which men of this class only were invited. The idea was taken up and practiced by other railroad cities, and, finally, the International Committee undertook the general supervision of this branch. Since the beginning of 1877 a general railroad secretary has given his entire time to this work, organizing associations, locating secretaries, visiting associations, and holding conventions. There are now more than forty railroad organizations, with a membership of about 5000.

In 1874 the first meeting of the National Bund of German-speaking Associations was held in Baltimore. A competent secretary was chosen, and the International Committee asked to sustain him. The work of this secretary is to visit German communities and organize associations. The field embraces the young men to be found among the two millions of German-speaking inhabitants in America.

The general work among colleges was begun in 1877, when a visitor was placed in the field. The work has yielded abundant fruit. There are now 96 associations in colleges, with a total membership of 4268.

A secretary has been sent to visit the colored young men of the Southern States, to organize associations, but more especially to instruct them in right methods of Christian endeavor.

A great work has been undertaken in behalf of commercial travellers. A ticket has been issued by the International Committee, which entitles the holder to all the privileges of the associations where he may be travelling. A secretary for commercial travellers has been appointed, and the work of this department receives his attention.

So the work is ever enlarging and reaching out into new fields. In 1868 the committee expended in its entire work $1390. Now, with the recent development of the work in all its departments, $22,000 are required annually to meet the demands upon it.

III. The Outlook.—In its Statement of Work for 1880, the International Committee has announced the following as its field of labor: "60,000 college students; 100,000 commercial travellers; 500,000 German-speaking young men; 500,000 colored young men; 800,000 railroad men; the young men in the states west of Ohio; the young men at the South; the young men in Canada; the Young Men's Christian Associations of North America." They state that the work "will call for the undivided effort of nine men; the co-operation, for brief periods, of twenty-five members and forty corresponding members of the committee in every state and province; the visitation of more than 550 places; 130,000 miles of travel by these workers; distribution of pamphlets and documents relating to the work, with necessary correspondence. All this can be done with so much economy that $22,000 will cover the total cost." In America the field is almost unlimited, and with its present facilities, the International Executive Committee will go on enlarging the work and gathering power while there are any young men yet unsaved.

IV. Statistics.—There have been eight World's Conferences held—beginning with that at Paris in 1855, and ending with that at Geneva, Switzerland, in 1878. Twenty-three American International Conventions have been held—beginning with the one at Buffalo in 1854, and ending with the one at Baltimore in 1879. There were thirty State and Provincial conventions held during the year ending June, 1880. There is, over and above the committees already referred to, an International Central Committee, appointed by the World's Conference at Geneva in 1878. This committee represents eight Christian countries, and has headquarters at Geneva, where the general secretary and one half of the members reside. In America there are 9 International secretaries, 13 State secretaries, 111 general secretaries, and 45 assistants and other agents.

The following table will indicate in some degree the wonderful growth of the Young Men's Christian Associations in this country. The figures, however, do not fully represent the facts. Many associations send in no reports. Their membership, property, libraries, and work must therefore be left out of the account. Much of the work, also, is of such a nature that it cannot be represented in statistical tables. The information about this work in foreign lands is meagre, but enough is known to give some idea of the proportions it has assumed in several countries.

Other Countries.—The latest reports from the British Isles show 281 associations. In 1879 partial returns indicated an average membership of 160 in England. Many societies in Great Britain own the buildings in which they keep open reading-rooms, and employ the same general plans in their work as have already been described.

There are in France 65 associations, but the membership is very small, averaging less than 20.

In Germany the statistics are more encouraging. There are 293 associations in all, of which 173 report a membership of 8035, 113 have libraries aggregating 20,710 volumes, 170 sustain educational classes, and 173 conduct Bible classes.

The total number of associations in Holland is 406; but we have no report of membership or other items.

In Switzerland there are 204 associations, 60 of which report a membership of 1284. There are also 22 Boys' Associations. The most of these societies sustain prayer-meetings, Bible classes, song services, and Sunday-schools; several have courses of lectures, and a few own libraries. The great majority of them have been organized within a few years, and more may be expected in the future than has yet been done.

Sweden has 81 associations, with 3485 members.

The following additional associations in various countries are reported:—Italy, 6; Spain, 8; Austria, 1; Belgium, 16; India, 2; Syria, 4—the one at Beirut, organized in 1870, has 60 members, and a library of 160 volumes; the others are at Damascus, Jaffa, and Nazareth; South Africa, 6; Japan, 2; Madagascar, 1; Sandwich Islands, 1.

There are in the world, so far as reported, 2371 associations.

Most of the information contained in this article has been obtained from documents published by the American International Committee, especially a Historical Sketch of the Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States, etc., written by Richard C. Morse, secretary of the International Committee (N. Y. 1878); and the Year-book of the International Committee for 1880-81. See also Harper's Magazine, Oct. 1870, p. 641 sq.

Z.

Zaan'a'im (Heb. Tsaana'yim, זַאנַא'יִם; Sept. πλεονεκτούντων v. r. ἀναπανομένων; Vulg. Sennim), the name of a "plain" (זַנַּן, elôn), more accurately "the oak by (א) Zaannaim," a tree—probably a sacred tree—mentioned as marking the spot near which Heber the Kenite was encamped when Sisera took refuge in his tent (Judg. iv, 11). Its situation is defined as "near Kedesh," i. e. Kedesh-Naphtali, the name of which still lingers on the high ground north of Safed and west of the lake of el-Huleh, usually identified with the Waters of Merom. The Targum gives as the equivalent of the name mishôr agganîyâ, "the plain of the swamp;" and in the well-known passage of the Talmud (Megillah Jerush. ch. i) which contains a list of several of the towns of Galilee with their then identifications, the equivalent for "Elon (or Ajalon) be-Zaannaim" is Agniya hak-kodesh. Agne appears to signify a swamp, and can hardly refer to anything but the marsh which borders the lake of Huleh on the north side, and which was probably more extensive in the time of Deborah than it now is. See MEROM. On the other hand, Prof. Stanley has pointed out (Jewish Church, p. 324; Localities, p. 197) how appropriate a situation for this memorable tree is afforded by "a green plain . . . studded with massive terebinths," which adjoins on the south the plain containing the remains of Kedesh. The whole of this upland country is more or less rich in terebinths. One such, larger than usual, and bearing the name of Sejar em-Messiah, is marked on the map of Van de Velde as six miles north-west of Kedes. The name Zaanaim, which appears to signify "removings" (as if a camping-ground), has passed away—at least no trace of it has yet been discovered (Porter, Handbook, p. 444; Van de Velde, Travels, ii, 418). "From the identity of signification, it has been conjectured to be Bessûn, a little east of Tabor. In this plain the black tents of the Bedawin, the modern Kenites, may constantly be seen" (Tristram, Bible Places, p. 278). See ZAANANIM.

Za'ānan (Heb. Tsaanān, זַאנַאן; Sept. Σεννάρι; Vulg. in exitu), a place named by Micah (i, 11) in his address to the towns of the Shefēlah. This sentence, like others of the same passage, contains a play of words founded on the meaning (or on a possible meaning) of the name Zaanān, as derived from yatsâ, to go forth: "The inhabitress of Tsaanān came not forth." Both Gesenius and Fürst, however, connect the word with זַנַּן, making it mean a place abounding with (or fit for) flocks. The division of the passage shown in the Sept. and A. V., by which Zaanān is connected with Beth-ezel, is now generally recognised as inaccurate. It is thus given by Dr. Pusey, in his Commentary, "The inhabitant of Zaanān came not forth. The mourning of Beth-ezel shall take from you its standing." So also Ewald, De Wette, and Zunz. The place is doubtless identical with ZENAN (q. v.).

Zaanan'nim (Heb. Tsaanannim', זַאנַאנִּים; Sept. Βεανανίμ v. r. Σεανανίμ; Vulg. Saananim), a place mentioned only (in this form) in Josh. xix, 33, and in the Keri or margin of Judg. iv, 11; but usually thought to be the more correct form of Zaannaim (q. v.), which occurs in the text of the latter passage. It appears to be derived (if a Hebrew word) from a root (זָנַן, to migrate) signifying to load beasts as nomads do when they change their places of residence (Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 1177). The rendering of the A. V. is incorrect: "And their coast was from Heleph, from Allon to Zaannaim." The Hebrew is זַאנַאנִּים בְּעֵלֶפֶת מֵאֵלֹן לְזַאנַאנִּים, and can only signify "from the oak of (or "in") Zaannaim" (see Keil, ad loc.; Reland, Palæst. p. 717; Keil and Delitzsch, On Judg. iv, 11; Porter, Giant Cities of Bashan, p. 268).

Za'avan (Heb. Tsaavan', זַאבָּאן; Sept. Ζουκάμ v. r. Ἰωκάμ; Vulg. Zavan), a Horite chieftain, second named of the three sons of Ezer (Gen. xxxvi, 27; 1 Chron. i, 42, "Zavan"). B.C. post 1927.

Za'bad (Heb. Zabad', זַבָּד; Sept. Zaβίδ v. r. Zaβίρ or Zaβár, etc.), the name of several Hebrews.

1. One of David's warriors, being son of Nathan and father of Ephlai, in the lineage of Sheshan's daughter Ahlai by the Egyptian slave Jarha (1 Chron. ii, 36, 37; xi, 41). B.C. 1046.

2. An Ephraimite, son of Tahath and father of Shuthelah 2 (1 Chron. vii, 21). B.C. post 1875.

3. The regicide, son of an Ammonitess named Shim-eath, who, in conjunction with Jehozabad, the son of a Moabitess, slew king Joash, to whom they were both household officers, in his bed (2 Kings xii, 21; 2 Chron. xxiv, 25, 26). In the first of these texts he is called JOZACHAR (q. v.). The sacred historian does not appear to record the mongrel parentage of these men as suggesting a reason for their being more easily led to this act, but as indicating the sense which was entertained of the enormity of Joash's conduct that even they, though servants to the king, and though only half Jews by birth, were led to conspire against him "for the blood of the sons of Jehoiada the priest." It would seem that their murderous act was not abhorred by the people; for Amaziah, the son of Joash, did not venture to call them to account till he felt himself well established on the throne, when they were both put to death (2 Kings xiv, 5, 6; 2 Chron. xxv, 3, 4). Joash had become unpopular from his idolatries (xxiv, 18), his oppression (ver. 22), and, above all, his calamities (ver. 23-25). The assassins were both put to death by Amaziah, but their children were spared in obedience to the law of Moses (Deut. xxiv, 16). The coincidence between the names Zechariah and Jozachar is remarkable.

4, 5, 6. Three Israelites, "sons" respectively of Zattu (Ezra, x, 27), Hashum (x, 33), and Nebo (x, 43), who divorced their Gentile wives, married after the return from Babylon. B.C. 458.

Zabadæ'an (Ζαβδαῖος), the designation of an Arab tribe who were attacked and spoiled by Jonathan, on his way back to Damascus from his fruitless pursuit of the army of Demetrius (1 Macc. xii, 31). Josephus calls them Nabataeans (Ant. xiii, 5, 10), but he is evidently in error. Nothing certain is known of them. Ewald (Gesch. iv, 382) finds a trace of their name in that of the place Zabda given by Robinson in his lists; but this is too far south, between the Yarmuk and the Zerka. Michaelis suggests the Arab tribe Zobeideh; but they do not appear in the necessary locality. Jonathan had pursued the enemy's army as far as the river Eleutherus (Nahr el-Kebir), and was on his march back to Damascus when he attacked and plundered the Zabadæans. We must look for them, therefore, somewhere to the north-west of Damascus. Accordingly, on the road from Damascus to Baalbek, at a distance of eight and two-third hours (twenty-six miles) from the former place, is the village of Zebdāny, standing at the upper end of a plain of the same name, which is the very centre of Antilibanus. The name is possibly a relic of the ancient tribe of the Zabadæans. According to Burckhardt (Syria, p. 3), the plain "is about three quarters of an hour in breadth and three hours in length; it is called Ard Zebdeni, or the district of Zebdeni; it is watered by the Barrada, one of whose sources is in the midst of it, and by the rivulet called Moud Zebdeni, whose source is in the mountain behind the village of the same name." The plain is "limited on one side by the eastern part of the Antilibanus, called here Jebel Zebdenti. The village is of considerable size, containing nearly 3000 inhabitants, who breed cattle and the silkworm, and have some dyeing-houses" (ibid.). Not far from Zebdān, on the western slopes of Antilibanus, is another village called Kefr Zebad, which again seems to point to this as the district formerly occupied by the Zabadaeans.

Zabadai'as (Zaβadaiaς), the Greek form (1 Esdr. ix, 35) of the Heb. name (Ezra x, 43) ZABAD (q. v.).

Zab'bai (Heb. Zabbay', זַבַּי [prob. an error for זַכַּי, Zakkay']; Sept. Zaβού; Vulg. Zabbai and Zachai), the name of two Hebrews.

1. The father of Baruch, which latter repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh. iii, 20). B.C. ante 446. He is perhaps the same with ZACCAL (q. v.) of Ezra ii, 9.

2. A descendant of Bebai, who divorced his Gentile wife married after the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 28). B.C. 458.

Zab'būd (Heb. Zabbud', זַבְּדִי [prob. an error for זַכְּרִי, Zakkūr, as in the marg.]; Sept. Zaβούδ), a "son" of Bigvai who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii, 14). B.C. 459. See ZACCUR.

Zabdæ'us (Zaβδαιος), the Greek form (1 Esdr. ix, 21) of the Heb. name (Ezra x, 20) ZEBADIAH (q. v.).

Zab'di (Heb. Zabdi', זַבְּדִי, my gift; Sept. Zaβδῖ, Zaβῑ, Zamβῑ, etc.; Vulg. Zabdi, Zabdiās), the name of several Hebrews.

1. Son of Zerah and father of Carmi the son of Achan of the tribe of Judah (Josh. vii, 1, 17, 18). B.C. ante 1618.

2. Third named of the nine sons of Shimhi (Shimei) the Benjamite (1 Chron. viii, 19). B.C. cir. 1612.

3. A Shipmite (i. e. inhabitant of Shepham), David's commissary of vineyards and wine-cellars (1 Chron. xxvii, 27). B.C. 1043.

4. An Asaphite, father of Micha and grandfather of Mattaniah (Neh. xi, 17); elsewhere called ZACCUR (xii, 35) and ZICHRI (1 Chron. ix, 15). B.C. ante 446.

Zab'diel (Heb. Zabdiel', זַבְּדִי־אֵל, gift of God), the name of three Jews mentioned in the Old Test. and Apocrypha.

1. (Sept. Zaβδῖλ.) The father of Jashobeam, the chief of David's warriors (1 Chron. xxvii, 2). B.C. ante 1046.

2. (Sept. Zoxpῖλ v. r. Badῖλ.) Son of Haggadolim ("one of the great men") and overseer of 128 of the captives returned from Babylon (Neh. xi, 14). B.C. 459.

3. (Sept. Zaβδῖλ); Josephus, Zάβηλος; Vulg. Zabdiel.) An Arabian chieftain who put Alexander Balas to death (1 Macc. xi, 17; Josephus, Ant. xiii, 4, 8). According to Diodorus, Balas was murdered by two of the officers who accompanied him (Müller, Fragm. Hist. ii, 16).

Zabriaskie, JOHN LANSING, a venerated clergyman of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America, was born in 1779 at Albany, N. Y. He graduated at Union College in 1797, studied theology under Dr. Theodorice Romeyn, and was licensed by the Classis of Albany in 1800. His first settlement was in the united churches of Greenbush and Wynantskill, near Albany, in 1800-11. In the latter year he removed to Hillsborough (or Millstone), near New Brunswick, N. J., where he ministered until his death, in 1850. His pulpit and parochial labors were said to be greater than those of any other minister of the region. He was a judicious, sensible, wise man; an excellent "old-fashioned" preacher; evangelical, earnest, and practical; a father to his people, and venerated by the ministry. His career was quietly useful, his character unspotted by the world, and his memory is cherished among the godly people of his large and important charge, upon whom he left the permanent stamp of his faithful teachings. He was in person short and stout, with a large head and face, genial in expression, and easy in his manners. With all his habitual gravity and professional air, at times "in his social intercourse he would astonish and excite you by his wit, his sarcasm, and even drollery." His talents were good, and his attainments in the old theology were respectable. He knew the Gospel, and felt it and preached it with clearness, zeal, and often with great power of immediate impression. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, p. 277, 278. (W. J. R. T.)

Za'būd (Heb. Zabud', זַבְּדִי, given; Sept. Zaβούδ v. r. Zaβούθ), son of Nathan the prophet (1 Kings iv, 5). B.C. 1012. He is described as a priest (A. V., "principal officer"), and as holding at the court of Solomon the confidential post of "king's friend," which had been occupied by Hushai the Archite during the reign of David (2 Sam. xv, 37; xvi, 16; 1 Chron. xxvii, 33). This position, if it were an official one, was evidently distinct from that of counsellor, occupied by Ahithophel under David, and had more of the character of private friendship about it, for Absalom conversely calls David the "friend" of Hushai (2 Sam. xvi, 17). Azariah, another son of Nathan, was "over all the (household) officers" of king Solomon; and their advancement may doubtless be ascribed not only to the young king's respect for the venerable prophet, who had been his instructor, but to the friendship he had contracted with his sons during the course of education. The office, or rather honor, of "friend of the king" we find in all the despotic governments of the East. It gives high power, without the public responsibility which the holding of a regular office in the State necessarily imposes. It implies the possession of the utmost confidence of, and familiar intercourse with, the monarch, to whose person "the friend" at all times has access, and whose influence is therefore often far greater, even in matters of state, than that of the recognised ministers of government. In the Vat. MS. of the Sept. the word "priest" is omitted, and in the Arabic of the London Polyglot it is referred to Nathan. The Peshito-Syriac and several Hebrew MSS. for "Zabud" read "Zaccur." The same occurs in the case of ZABBUD.

Zab'ulon (Zaβουλών), the Greek form (Matt. iv, 13, 15; Rev. vii, 8) of the Heb. name ZEBULUN (q. v.).

Zac'cal (Heb. Zakkay', זַכַּי, pure; Sept. Zakxai v. r. Zakxou), the ancestor of 760 of the Israelites who returned from Babylon (Ezra ii, 9; Neh. vii, 14). B.C. ante 536. See also ZABBAI; ZACCHÆUS.

Zacchæ'us (Zαχαῖος, for the Heb. Zaccal [q. v.]), the name of two Jews, mentioned the one in the Apocrypha, and the other in the New Test.

1. An officer of Judas Maccabæus left with two others to besiege the citadel of Zion (2 Macc. x, 19). Grotius, from a mistaken reference to 1 Macc. v, 56, wishes to read καὶ τὸν τοῦ Ζαχαρίου.

2. The name of a tax-collector near Jericho, who, being short in stature, climbed up into a sycamore-tree, in order to obtain a sight of Jesus as he passed through that place. Luke only has related the incident (xix, 1-10). Zacchæus was a Jew, as may be inferred from his name and from the fact that the Saviour speaks of him expressly as "a son of Abraham" (υἱὸς Ἀβραάμ). So the latter expression should be understood, and not in a spiritual sense; for it was evidently meant to assert that he was one of the chosen race, notwithstanding the prejudice of some of his countrymen that his office under the Roman government made him an alien and outcast from the privileges of the Israelite. The term which designates this office (ἀρχιτελωνης) is unusual, but describes him, no doubt, as the superintendent of customs or tribute in the district of Jericho, where he lived, as one having a commission from his Roman principal (manceps, publicanus).

to collect the imposts levied on the Jews by the Romans, and who in the execution of that trust employed subalterns (the ordinary τελώναι), who were accountable to him, as he in turn was accountable to his superior, whether he resided at Rome, as was more commonly the case, or in the province itself. See PUBLICAN. The office must have been a lucrative one in such a region, and it is not strange that Zacchæus is mentioned by the evangelist as a rich man (ὁὗτος ἦν πλοῖσιος). Josephus states (Ant. xv, 4, 2) that the palm-groves of Jericho and its gardens of balsam were given as a source of revenue by Antony to Cleopatra, and, on account of their value, were afterwards redeemed by Herod the Great for his own benefit. The sycamore-tree is no longer found in that neighborhood (Robinson, Bibl. Res. i, 559); but no one should be surprised at this, since "even the solitary relic of the palm-forest, seen as late as 1838"—which existed near Jericho, has now disappeared (Stanley, Sinai and Pal. p. 307). The eagerness of Zacchæus to behold Jesus indicates a deeper interest than that of mere curiosity. He must have had some knowledge, by report at least, of the teachings of Christ, as well as of his wonder-working power, and could thus have been awakened to some just religious feeling, which would make him the more anxious to see the announcer of the good tidings, so important to men as sinners. The readiness of Christ to take up his abode with him, and his declaration that "salvation" had that day come to the house of his entertainer, prove sufficiently that "He who knows what is in man" perceived in him a religious susceptibility which fitted him to be the recipient of spiritual blessings. Reflection upon his conduct on the part of Zacchæus himself appears to have revealed to him deficiencies which disturbed his conscience, and he was ready, on being instructed more fully in regard to the way of life, to engage to "restore fourfold" for the illegal exactions of which he would not venture to deny (εἰ τινός τι ἰσχυρόντησα) that he might have been guilty. At all events, he had not lived in such a manner as to overcome the prejudice which the Jews entertained against individuals of his class, and their censure fell on him as well as on Christ when they declared that the latter had not scorned to avail himself of the hospitality of "a man that was a sinner." The Saviour spent the night probably (μῦναι, ver. 5, and καταλίσαι, ver. 7, are the terms used) in the house of Zacchæus, and the next day pursued his journey to Jerusalem. He was in the caravan from Galilee, which was going up thither to keep the Passover. The entire scene is well illustrated by Oosterzee (Lange, Bibel-werk, iii, 285).

We read in the Rabbinic writings also of a Zacchæus who lived at Jericho at this same period, well known on his own account, and especially as the father of the celebrated rabbi Jochanan ben-Zachai (see Sepp, Leben Jesu, iii, 166). This person may have been related to the Zacchæus named in the sacred narrative. The family of the Zacchæi was an ancient one, as well as very numerous. They are mentioned in the books of Ezra (ii, 9) and Nehemiah (vii, 14) as among those who returned from the Babylonian captivity under Zerubbabel, when their number amounted to seven hundred and sixty. For the modern traditions respecting Zacchæus's house, see Robinson (Bibl. Res. ii, 543). According to ecclesiastical tradition, Zacchæus eventually became bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine (Const. Nat. Apost. vii, 46; comp. Clement, Recogn. iii, 65 sq.). See Sturemberg, Zacchæus Illustratus, in the Symbol. Duisb.; Kresse, De Sycamore Zacchæi (Lips. 1694); Crossman, Hist. of Zacchæus (Lond. 1854); and the literature referred to by Darling, Cyclop. Bibliog. col. 1031, 1032. See JESUS CHRIST.

Zac'chur or Zac'cur (Heb. Zakkur', זַכְּכֹּר, mindful; Sept. Zakxoup v. r. Zakoup or Zakxoup), the name of several Hebrews. See ZABBUD.

1. A Simeonite, son of Hamuel and father of the Shimei whose posterity became numerous (1 Chron. iv, 26, A. V. "Zacchur"). B. C. considerably ante 1612.

2. The father of Shimea, which latter was the Reubenite "spy" sent out to explore Canaan the second time (Numb. xiii, 4). B. C. ante 1618.

3. A Levite, third named of the four "sons of Merari by Jaaziah" (1 Chron. xxiv, 27). B. C. 1043.

4. First named of the four sons of Asaph as Levitical musicians in the arrangement of David (1 Chron. xxv, 2, 10; Neh. xii, 35). B. C. 1043.

5. Son of Imri and builder of part of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii, 2). B. C. 446.

6. Son of Mattaniah and father of the Hanan whom Nehemiah appointed to distribute the treasures (Neh. xiii, 13). B. C. ante 410.

7. A Levite who signed the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x, 12). B. C. 410.

Zachariä, GORTHLIF TRAUGOTT, a German theologian, was born at Tauchardt, in Thuringia, in 1729, and studied at Königsberg and Halle, being the pupil, associate, and amanuensis in the latter place of the learned Baumgarten. He was called in 1760 to the newly founded University of Butzow, in 1765 to Göttingen, and in 1775 to Kiel, where he died two years afterwards. His reputation as a scholar rests principally upon the Biblische Theologie, oder Untersuchung des Grundes der vornehmsten biblischen Lehren (1771-75, 4 pts., 3 sections, with Suppl. by Volborth [1786]). The work occupied the supernaturalistic ground held by Baumgarten, professing a belief in revelation and miracles, but applying the historico-critical method of interpretation to the proofs deduced from Scripture, and either eliminating them altogether or depriving them of any considerable force. The end of the divine economy of redemption is represented as being the blessedness which Christ will bestow, which consists in the fruits of his atonement. The necessity for an atonement is, however, said to conflict with the idea of the freedom of the divine will. A progressive economy of grace is spoken of, but is shown in its outward manifestations in the mere enumeration of historical events only. It is said to have been God's first design to establish faith in the true God, and to reveal nothing respecting Christ until the truth respecting God should have been sufficiently impressed on the minds of men. The work evidently does not deserve the encomiums bestowed on it by Nitzsch, Schenkel, etc. Zachariä published, besides, paraphrastic expositions of the epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Colossians, Thessalonians, Hebrews, etc., which were favorably received and repeatedly published. See Thiers, Gelehrten-gesch. der Universität Kiel, pt. ii; Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, pt. iv; Schenkel, in Stud. u. Krit. (Aufgabe der Bibl. Theol.), 1852, No. 1; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

Zachari'ah (a, 2 Kings xiv, 29; xv, 8, 11; b, 2 Kings xviii, 2). See ZECHARIAH.

Zachari'as (Zaxapiac), the Greek form of the Heb. name Zechariah; applied to several men in the Apocrypha and New Test., besides those mentioned in the Old Test.: the priest in Josiah's reign (1 Esdr. i, 8), the lesser prophet (vi, 1; vii, 3), the adviser of Ezra (viii, 44; comp. Ezra viii, 16), the "son" of Pharoah (1 Esdr. viii, 30; comp. Ezra viii, 3), the "son" of Bebai (1 Esdr. viii, 37; comp. Ezra viii, 11), a "son" of Elam (1 Esdr. ix, 27; comp. Ezra x, 26), and one (1 Esdr. i, 15) who is properly called Heman (2 Chron. xxxv, 15), and another (Zaxapiac, 1 Esdr. v, 8) properly called Azariah, or Seraiah (Ezra ii, 2; Neh. vii, 7).

1. Son of Barachias, who, our Lord says, was slain by the Jews between the altar and the Temple (Matt. xxiii, 35; Luke xi, 51). There has been much dispute who this Zacharias was. There is no reason to identify him with the Zechariah son of Jeberechiah mentioned in Isa. viii, 2. It is singular that Josephus (War, iv, 5, 4) mentions another Zacharias, son of Baruch, who was slain by the Jews in the Temple shortly before the last siege of Jerusalem began (see Whiston's note, ad loc.). From the time of Origen, who relates that the father of John the Baptist was killed in the Temple, many of the Greek fathers have maintained that this is the person to whom our Lord refers. The name of the father of Zacharias not being mentioned by Luke, some unwarrantably suppose that the name of Barachias crept into the text of Matthew from a marginal gloss, a confusion having been made between Zacharias, the son of Jehoiada, and Zacharias the prophet, the son of Barachias (Berechiah). There can be little or no doubt that the allusion is to Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxiv, 20, 21). As the book of Chronicles—in which the murder of this Zechariah occurs—closes the Hebrew canon, this assassination was the last of the murders of righteous men recorded in the Bible, just as that of Abel was the first (see Renan, Vie de Jésus, p. 353). See ZECHARIAH.

2. Father of Joseph, a leader in the first campaign of the Maccabean war (1 Macc. v, 18, 56-62).

3. Father of John the Baptist (Luke i, 5, etc.). B.C. ante 8.

Zacharias, pope from A.D. 741 to 752. He induced the Lombard king Luitprand to restore the cities taken from Rome in 739, to conclude a truce for twenty years, and subsequently to desist from the siege of Ravenna and restore all the territory taken from the exarchate. He was equally successful in influencing Luitprand's successor, Rachis, as respects the interruption of his conquests, and even received that monarch and his queen and daughter into the number of his clergy (749) after their abdication of the throne. He also consecrated Carloman to the clerical office (747). He advised the Byzantine emperor Copronymus to replace the images in the churches. Boniface, the apostle to the Germans, found in Zacharias an energetic and able manager of the interests of Rome, and became his agent in the elevation of the Carolingian dynasty. Zacharias held a synod in 743 at which fifty-nine bishops were present, and which dealt with questions of discipline. He translated the Dialogues of Gregory the Great into Greek, and purchased the liberty of many slaves destined by the Venetians for Africa. See Jaffé, Regesta Pontificum; Migne, Patrologie, tom. 89; Wirtwein and Giles, collections of Boniface's letters, St. Bonif. Opera (Lond. 1845), vol. i; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Zacharias, Daniel, D.D., an esteemed minister of the German Reformed Church, was born in Washington County, Md., Jan. 14, 1806. He united with the Church under the Rev. James Ross Reily, and soon afterwards commenced his classical studies, preparatory to the ministry, at the Hagerstown Academy, and finished the same in Canonsburg, Pa. Subsequently he entered the Seminary of the Reformed Church, then located in Carlisle, where he completed his theological course under the Rev. Lewis Mayer, D.D. He was licensed and ordained in 1828, and located in York County. In 1830 he took charge of the Reformed Church in Harrisburg, where he continued to labor until 1835, when he removed to Frederick City, Md. Here he labored with great acceptance and success to the close of his long and useful life. He died March 31, 1878. Dr. Zacharias was a man of superior natural endowments, high culture, amiable disposition, and more than ordinary pulpit abilities. "Few men have been so loved by their congregations, or have so grown into the affections of the community in which they lived." As a public speaker he was greatly admired, and universally esteemed as a most excellent pastor, genial companion, and trusty friend. He was chosen president of the District Synod in 1835, and of the General Synod in 1866. He aided materially in compiling the hymn-book of the Reformed Church, and also in getting up its present Order of Worship. See Ref. Church Mess. April 9, 1878. (D. Y. H.)

Zach'ary (Zacharias), a mode of Anglicizing (2 Esdr. i, 40) the name of the prophet ZECHARIAH.

Za'cher (Heb. Ze'ker, זֶכֶר, in pause Zu'ker, זֶכֶר, memorial; Sept. Ζαχούρ v. r. Ζαχούρ), last named of the eight sons of Jehiel the founder of Gibeon, by his wife Maachah (1 Chron. viii, 31); elsewhere (ix, 37) called Zechariah (q. v.).

Za'dok (Heb. Tsadok, צָדוֹק, righteous; Sept. Ζαδωκ v. r. Σαδδωκ, Σαδωκ, etc.; Josephus Σαδωκος, Ant. vii, 2, 2, etc.), the name of several Hebrews, and one that also appears occasionally in the post-Biblical history. The associate of Judah the Gaulonite, the well-known leader of the agitation against the census of Quirinus, was a certain Pharisee named Zadok (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 1, 1), and the sect of the Sadducees (q. v.) is reputed to have derived both its name and origin from a person of the same name, a disciple of Antigonus of Soho. (See Lightfoot, Hebr. and Talm. Exerc. on Matt. iii, 8; Renan, Vie de Jésus, p. 216.) A "Sadoc" (Σαδωκ) finally occurs in our Saviour's genealogy (Matt. i, 14). It is, moreover, worth noticing that the New-Test. name Justus (Acts i, 23; xviii, 7; Col. iv, 11) is the literal translation of Zadok. Zedekiah, Jehozadak, may likewise be compared.

1. Son of Ahitub, and one of the two chief priests in the time of David, Abiathar (q. v.) being the other. B.C. 1023. Zadok was of the house of Eleazar the son of Aaron (1 Chron. xxiv, 3). The first mention of him is in 1 Chron. xii, 28, where we are told that he joined David at Hebron, after Saul's death, with twenty-two captains of his father's house, and apparently with nine hundred men (4600-3700, ver. 26, 27). Up to this time, it may be concluded, he had adhered to the house of Saul. But henceforth his fidelity to David was inviolable. When Absalom revolted, and David fled from Jerusalem, Zadok and all the Levites bearing the ark accompanied him, and it was only at the king's express command that they returned to Jerusalem, and became the medium of communication between the king and Hushai the Archite (2 Sam. xv, xvii). When Absalom was dead, Zadok and Abiathar were the persons who persuaded the elders of Judah to invite David to return (xix, 11). When Adonijah, in David's old age, set up for king, and had persuaded Joab and Abiathar the priest to join his party, Zadok was unmoved, and was employed by David to anoint Solomon to be king in his room (1 Kings i). For this fidelity he was rewarded by Solomon, who "thrust out Abiathar from being priest unto the Lord," and "put in Zadok the priest" in his room (ii, 27, 35). From this time, however, we hear little of him. It is said in general terms, in the enumeration of Solomon's officers of state, that Zadok was the priest (iv, 4; 1 Chron. xxix, 22), but no single act of his is mentioned. Even in the detailed account of the building and dedication of Solomon's Temple his name does not occur, though Josephus says that "Sadoc the high-priest was the first high-priest of the Temple which Solomon built" (Ant. x, 8, 6). In 2 Sam. xv, 27 Zadok is named a seer; but we have no further or more particular information as to the revelations which were granted to him. See PRIEST.

We have no means of knowing how the high-priesthood passed out of the line of Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, who was the elder son of Aaron, into the line of Eli, who was descended from Ithamar, Aaron's younger son; but we do know the doom pronounced by Jehovah, that the unworthy house of Eli should be dispossessed. No doubt much confusion had ensued upon the death of Eli's two sons, and the capture of the ark by the Philistines; of this we have abundant evidence: (1) in the unsettled position of the tabernacle, till we find David honoring it at Gibeon; (2) in the want of interest in the ark, till he brought it up to Mount Zion; and (3) in the absence of any fixed centre of worship, so that Samuel sacrificed in different places, according to the irregular manner of that period of transition in which he presided. Saul apparently attempted to extirpate the high-priestly house of Eli, on account of what he reckoned the treason of Abimelech (1 Sam. xxii, 17-23), so that only his son Abiathar escaped; and the following chapter narrates how this young man came to David, carrying with him the high-priest's ephod, and how Jehovah acknowledged him as the true high-priest, inquiring of God, on behalf of that fugitive, who was the true king of Israel. The only conjecture we feel disposed to make is that king Saul may at this time have declared that Abiathar was an outlaw, who had forfeited the high-priesthood, and may have declared that the office reverted to the house of Eleazar, to which Zadok belonged; there might be a stroke of policy in his thus restoring the constitution of the priesthood according to the law of Moses, analogous to his slaughter of the Gibeonites, "in his zeal to the children of Israel and Judah" (2 Sam. xxi, 2). If so, it is easy to see how the two rival royal houses had their rival priestly houses too; and how, at the end of the civil war, David's policy of gradual and amicable reconstruction would lead him to acknowledge both high-priests, especially after Zadok's hearty adhesion to David's interest. Perhaps, in memory of his early military service, Zadok had a place among the princes of the tribes assigned him by David, as ruler over the Aaronites (1 Chron. xxvii, 17). In later times we usually find two priests, the high-priest and the second priest (2 Kings xxv, 18), and there does not seem to have been any great difference in their dignity. So, too, Luke iii, 2. Zadok and Abiathar were of nearly equal dignity (2 Sam. xv, 35, 36; xix, 11). Hophni and Phinehas, again, and Eleazar and Ithamar, are coupled together, and seem to have been holders of the office, as it were, in commission. The duties of the office, too, were, in the case of Zadok and Abiathar, divided. Zadok ministered before the tabernacle at Gibeon (1 Chron. xvi, 39); Abiathar had the care of the ark at Jerusalem; not, however, exclusively, as appears from 1 Chron. xv, 11; 2 Sam. xv, 24, 25, 29. Hence, perhaps, it may be concluded that from the first there was a tendency to consider the office of the priesthood as somewhat of the nature of a corporate office, although some of its functions were necessarily confined to the chief member of that corporation; and if so, it is very easy to perceive how superior abilities, on the one hand, and infancy or incapacity, on the other, might operate to raise or depress the members of this corporation respectively. Zadok seems to have been succeeded in the priesthood by his son Azariah (1 Kings iv, 2), strictly speaking his son's son, if we observe 1 Chron. vi, 8, 9, and 2 Sam. xv, 27. That it continued without derangement in his family may be inferred by the genealogies, and from the incidental reference to "Azariah, the chief priest, of the house of Zadok," in Hezekiah's time (2 Chron. xxxi, 10). The language in Ezek. xl, 46; xliii, 19; xlv, 15; xlviii, 11 bears high testimony to the faithfulness of the priests, the sons of Zadok; so much so that the prophet takes no notice of any priests besides them. See HIGH-PRIEST.

2. Father of Jerusha, who was the wife of king Uziah and mother of king Jotham (2 Kings xv, 38; 2 Chron. xxvii, 1). B.C. 755.

3. According to the genealogy of the high-priests in 1 Chron. vi, 12, there was a second Zadok, son of a second Ahitub, son of Amariah; and he is there given as the father of Shallum. B.C. cir. 700. He seems also to be referred to in ix, 11; Neh. xi, 11. Some critics are disposed to regard this name as an interpolation by a copyist's error; but the person in question seems to be the high-priest called Hosai in the Seder Olam, and Odeas (Ὀδέας) by Josephus (Ant. x, 8, 6). See HIGH-PRIEST.

4. Son of Baana, who repaired a portion of the wall in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. iii, 4). B.C. 446. He is probably the same as is in the list of those that sealed the covenant in Neh. x, 21. as in both cases his name follows that of Meshezabeel. But if so, we know that he was not a priest, as his name would at first sight lead one to suppose, but one of "the chief of the people," or laity. With this agrees his patronymic Baana, which indicates that he was of the tribe of Judah; for Baanah, one of David's mighty men, was a Netophathite (2 Sam. xxiii, 29), i. e. of Netophah, a city of Judah. The men of Tekoah, another city of Judah, worked next to Zadok. Meshullam of the house of Meshezabeel, who preceded him in both lists (Neh. iii, 4 and x, 20, 21) was also of the tribe of Judah (xi, 24). Intermarriages of the priestly house with the tribe of Judah were more frequent than with any other tribe.

5. Son of Immer, a priest who repaired a portion of the wall over against his own house (Neh. iii, 29). B.C. 446. He belonged to the 16th course (1 Chron. xxiv, 14), which was one of those that returned from Babylon (Ezra ii, 37).

6. A scribe, one of the three principal treasurers appointed by Nehemiah (Neh. xiii, 13). B.C. 410. He was perhaps identical with No. 4 or 5 above.

Za'ham (Heb. id., זָחָם, in pause זָחַם, rancidity or fattiness; Sept. Zadû v. r. Zalâû and Poolâû; Vulg. Zoom), last named of the three sons of Rehoboam by one of his wives (2 Chron. xii, 19), named Abihail (q. v.), according to the common version, but, as Keil maintains, (Comment. ad loc.) by Mahath (Abihail being the mother of the latter). B.C. 978.

Za'ir (Heb. Tsair', צַיִר, small, as often; Sept. Σίωρ; Vulg. Seira), a place named in 2 Kings viii, 21, in the account of Joram's expedition against the Edomites, as one to which he went with all his chariots. There he and his force appear to have been surrounded, and only to have escaped by cutting their way through in the night. This is not, however, the interpretation of the Jewish commentators, who take the word צַיִר to refer to the neighboring parts of the country of Edom (see Rashi, On 2 Chron. xxi, 9). The parallel account in Chronicles (xxi, 9) agrees with this, except that the words "to Zair" are omitted, and the words "with his princes" inserted. This is followed by Josephus (Ant. ix, 5, 1). The omitted and inserted words have a certain similarity both in sound and in their component letters, צַיִר and צַיִרִי; and on this it has been conjectured that the latter were substituted for the former either by the error of a copyist or intentionally, because the name Zair was not elsewhere known (see Keil, Comment. on 2 Kings viii, 21). Others, again, as Movers (Chronik. p. 218) and Ewald (Gesch. iii, 524), suggest that Zair is identical with Zoar (צִיֹר or צִיֹרָה). Certainly in the Middle Ages the road by which an army passed from Judea to the country formerly occupied by Edom lay through the place which was then believed to be Zoar, below Kerak, at the south-east quarter of the Dead Sea (Fulcher, Gesta Dei, p. 405), and so far this is in favor of the identification; but there is no other support to it in the MS. readings either of the original or the versions. A third conjecture, grounded on the readings of the Vulg. (Seira) and the Arab. version (Sa'ir), is that Zair is an alteration for Seir (שֵׁיר), the country itself of the Edomites (Thenius, Kurzgef. exeget. Handb.). The objection to this is that the name of Seir appears not to have been known to the author of the book of Kings.

Za'laph (Heb. Tsalaph', צֶלֶף, wound; Sept. Σελίφ v. r. Σελί and Ἐλίφ; Vulg. Seleph), the father of Hannun, which latter rebuilt part of the wall of Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. iii, 30). B.C. ante 446.

Zal'mon (Heb. Tsalmon', צֶלְמוֹן, slady; Sept. Σελμών v. r. Σελλώμ, etc.; Vulg. Selmon), the name of a man and of a hill.

1. An Ahohite, one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 28), called in the parallel passage (1 Chron. xi, 29) ILAI

(q. v.), which Kennicott prefers (Dissert. p. 187). See DAVID.

2. A mountain (הַר) or wooded eminence in the immediate neighborhood of Shechem, from which Abimelech and his people cut down the boughs with which he suffocated and burned the Shechemites who had taken refuge in the citadel (Judg. ix, 48). The reading of the Sept. here (Ἐρμών) is remarkable both in itself and in the fact that the two great MSS. agree in a reading so much removed from the Hebrew; but it is impossible to suppose that Hermon (at any rate, the well-known mountain of that name) is referred to in the narrative of Abimelech. The rabbins mention a place of the same name, but evidently far from the necessary position (Schwarz, Palest. p. 187). The name Suleimijeh is attached to the S.E. portion of Mount Ebal (see the map of Dr. Rosen, Zeitschr. der deutschen morgenl. Gesell. xiv, 634), and Jebel Sleiman is the name of a high conspicuous summit S.W. of and linked with Mount Gerizim, having on it a tomb attributed by Mohammedan tradition to Sleiman el-Farsi (Van de Velde, Memoir. p. 354). The only high mountains around Shechem are Ebal and Gerizim, and Zalmon may be another name for one of these. The name of Dalmanutha has been supposed by some to be a corruption of that of Tsalmon (Otho, Lex. Rabb. a. v. "Dalmanutha").

It is usually supposed that this hill is mentioned in Psa. lxxviii, 14 (A. V. "Salmon"); and this is probable, though the passage is peculiarly difficult, and the precise allusion intended by the poet seems hopelessly lost. Commentators differ from each other; and Fürst, within 176 pages of his Handwörterbuch, differs from himself (see שָׁלֹמֹן and שָׁלֵמוֹן). Indeed, of six distinguished modern commentators—De Wette, Hitzig, Ewald, Hengstenberg, Delitzsch, and Hupfeld—no two give distinctly the same meaning; and Mr. Keble, in his admirable version of the Psalms, gives a translation which, though poetical, as was to be expected, differs from any one of those suggested by these six scholars. The literal translation of the words הַרְשִׁיבֵּן הַשֶּׁלֶג is "Thou wouldst make it snow," or "It would snow," with liberty to use the verb either in the past or in the future sense. As, notwithstanding ingenious attempts, this supplies no satisfactory meaning, recourse is had to a translation of a comparative character, "Thou makest it white as snow," or "It is white as snow"—words to which various metaphorical meanings have been attributed. The allusion which, through the Lexicon of Gesenius, is most generally received is that the phrase refers to the ground being snow-white with bones after a defeat of the Canaanitish kings, and this may be accepted by those who will admit that bleaching bones would be left upon a battle-field. At the same time, it is to be remembered that the figure is a very harsh one, and that it is not really justified by passages quoted in illustration of it from Latin classical writers, such as "campique ingentes ossibus albet" (Virgil, Æn. xii, 36) and "humanis ossibus albet humus" (Ovid, Fast. i, 558), for in these cases the word "bones" is actually used in the text, and is not left to be supplied by the imagination. Granted, however, that an allusion is made to bones of the slain, there is a divergence of opinion as to whether Salmon was mentioned simply because it had been the battle-ground of some great defeat of the Canaanitish kings, or whether it is only introduced as an image of snowy whiteness. Of these two explanations, the first would be, on the whole, most probable; for Salmon cannot have been a very high mountain, as the highest mountains near Shechem are Ebal and Gerizim, and of these Ebal, the highest of the two, is only 1028 feet higher than the city (see Robinson's Gesenius, p. 895 a). If the poet had desired to use the image of a snowy mountain, it would have been more natural to select Hermon, which is visible from the eastern brow of Gerizim, is about 10,000 feet high, and is covered with perpetual snow. Still it is not meant that this circumstance by itself would be conclusive, for there may have been particular associations in the mind of the poet unknown to us which led him to prefer Salmon.—Smith. It is perhaps not too great a stretch of fancy in this highly figurative Psalm to suppose that the hill in question, being near Shechem, in the centre of the country, may have been (or conceived as being) the scene of a severe engagement in the conquest of Canaan; and the prostrate bodies of the slain foe, covered with their white Oriental garments, are pictured like snow upon the distant background of the dark mountain-side. The use of the Heb. future points out the conceptual character of the statement, and justifies the translation as a metaphor, "It seemed to snow."

Zalmon'nah (Heb. Tsalmonah', צַלְמוֹנָה, shady; Sept. Σαλμωνά; Vulg. Salmona), the name of a desert station (the 46th) of the Israelites, which they reached between leaving Mount Hor and camping at Punon, although they must have turned the southern point of Edomitish territory by the way (Numb. xxxiii, 41). It therefore lay on the south-east side of Edom, but hardly so far north as Maan, a few miles east of Petra, as Raumer thinks. More probably Zalmonah may be in the Wady el-Amran, which runs into the Wady Itim, close to where Elath anciently stood. See EXODUS.

Zalmun'na (Heb. Tsalmunna', צַלְמוֹנָה, apparently from צַל, shadow, and מָנַח, to withhold, i. e. deprived of protection; Sept. and Josephus, Σαλμωνά), last named of the two "kings" of Midian, whose capture and death by the hands of Gideon himself formed the last act of his great conflict with Midian (Judg. viii, 5-21; Psa. lxxxiii, 11). B.C. 1361. See ZEBI.

The distinction between the "kings" (מְלָכִים, melakim) and the "princes" (שָׂרִים, sarim) of the Midianites on this occasion is carefully maintained throughout the narrative (Judg. viii, 5, 12, 26). "Kings" of Midian are also mentioned in Numb. xxxi, 8; but when the same transaction is referred to in Josh. xiii, 21, they are designated by a different title (נְסִימִים, nesimim; A. V. "princes"). Elsewhere (Numb. xxii, 4, 7) the term elders (זִקְנִים, zekenim) is used, answering in signification, if not in etymology, to the Arabic sheik. It is difficult, perhaps impossible, to tell how far these distinctions are accurate, and how far they represent the imperfect acquaintance which the Hebrews must have had with the organization of a people with whom, except during the orgies of Shittim, they appear to have been always more or less at strife and warfare (1 Chron. v, 10, 19-22). The unintelligibility of the names is in favor of their being correctly retained rather than the reverse. It should not be overlooked that they are not, like Oreb and Zeeb, attached also to localities, which always throws a doubt on the name when attributed to a person as well. Josephus inverts the distinction. He styles Oreb and Zeeb βασιλείς, and Zebah and Zalmunna ἡγεμόνες (Ant. v, 7, 5). The vast horde which Gideon repelled must have included many tribes under the general designation of "Midianites, Amalekites, children of the East," and nothing would be easier or more natural than for the Hebrew scribes who chronicled the events to confuse one tribe with another in so minute a point as the title of a chief. In the great Bedawin tribes of the present day, who occupy the place of Midian and Amalek, there is no distinctive appellation answering to the melék and sâr of the Hebrew narrative. Differences in rank and power there are as between the great chief, the acknowledged head of the parent tribe, and the lesser chiefs who lead the sub-tribes into which it is divided, and who are, to a great extent, independent of him. But the one word sheik is employed for all. The great chief is the sheik el-kebir; the others are min el-mashik, "of the sheiks," i. e. of sheik rank. See MIDIANITE.

Zam'brî (Ζαμβρί, Vulg. Zamrî), the Greek form

(1 Macc. ii, 26) of the Heb. name (Numb. xxv, 14) ZIMRI (q. v.).

Zam'bris (Ζαμβρίς v. r. Ζαμβρί), a corrupt Greek form (1 Esdr. ix, 34) of the Heb. name (Ezra x, 42) AMARIAH (q. v.).

Za'moth (Ζαμόθ v. r. Ζαμόθ, Vulg. Zuthoim), a corrupt Greek form (1 Esdr. ix, 28) of the Heb. name (Ezra x, 27) ZATTU (q. v.).

Zamzum'mim (Heb. Zamzumim', זַמְזוּמִים; Sept. Ζουζουμειν v. r. Ζοζουμιν, Vulg. Zomzommim, A. V. "Zamzumims"), the Ammonitish name for the people who by others (though who they were does not appear) were called Rephaim (q. v.) (Deut. ii, 20 only). They are described as having originally been a powerful and numerous nation of giants—"great, many, and tall"—inhabiting the district which at the time of the Hebrew conquest was in the possession of the Ammonites, by whom the Zamzumim had a long time previously been destroyed. Where this district was it is not, perhaps, possible exactly to define; but it probably lay in the neighborhood of Rabbath-Ammon (the present Ammān), the only city of the Ammonites of which the name or situation is preserved to us, and therefore eastward of that rich undulating country from which Moab had been forced by the Amorites (the modern Belka), and of the numerous towns of that country whose ruins and names are still encountered.

From a slight similarity between the two names, and from the mention of the Emim in connection with each, it is usually assumed that the Zamzumim are identical with the Zuzim (q. v.) (Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 410 a; Ewald, Gesch. i, 308, note; Knobel, On Gen. xiv, 5). Ewald further supports this by identifying Ham (q. v.), the capital city of the Zuzim (Gen. xiv, 5), with Ammon. But at best the identification is very conjectural.

Various attempts have been made to explain the name: as, by comparison with the Arabic zamzam, "long-necked;" or samsam, "strong and big" (Simonis, Onomast. p. 135); or as "obstinate," from זָמַן (Luther), or as "noisy," from זִמְזִי (Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 419), or as onomatopoeitic, intended to imitate the unintelligible jabber of foreigners. Michaelis (Supplem. No. 629) playfully recalls the likeness of the name to that of the well Zem-zem at Mecca, and suggests thereupon that the tribe may have originally come from Southern Arabia. Notwithstanding this banter, however, he ends his article with the following discreet words, "Nihil historię, nihil originis populi novimus: fas sit etymologium æque ignorare." See Journ. Sac. Lit. 1852, p. 366.

Zano'ah (Heb. Zano'ach, זָנוֹחַ [Neh. xi, 30, זָנוֹחַ], prob. marsh), the name of two towns in the tribe of Judah.

1. (Sept. Zavó v. r. Tavó, Vulg. Zanoá.) A place in the lowland (Shephelah), named in connection with Zoreah and Jarmuth (Josh. xv, 34), in the group occupying the north-western corner of the district. See JUDAH. The name recurs in its old connection in the lists of Nehemiah, both of the towns which were re-inhabited by the people of Judah after the Captivity (xi, 30), and of those which assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (iii, 13). Jerome says (Onomast. s. v. "Zanohua") that it was still called Zama in his day, and lay in the region of Eleutheropolis on the way to Jerusalem. The name and position tolerably correspond to those of Zanú'a, a site which was pointed out to Dr. Robinson from Beit Nettif (Bibl. Res. ii, 16), and which in the maps of Van de Velde and of Tobler (Dritte Wanderung) is located on the north side of the Wady Ismail, two miles east of Zareah, and four miles north of Yarmuk. Rabbi Schwarz inaccurately calls it Zamea (Palest. p. 102).

2. (Sept. [in Josh., taking in the following name]

Zawakéim v. r. Zakaváim, Vulg. Zanoél; in Chron. Zapón, Vulg. Zanoá.) A town in the highland district, the mountain proper (Josh. xv, 56), named in the same group with Maon, Carmel, Ziph, and other places known to lie south of Hebron. It is (as Van de Velde suggests, Memoir, p. 354) not improbably identical with Sanúte, which is mentioned by Seetzen (Reisen, iii, 29) as below Senula, and appears to be about ten miles south of Hebron. At the time of his visit it was the last inhabited place to the south. Robinson (Bibl. Res. ii, 204, note) gives the name differently, Za'nútah; and it will be observed that, like Zanu'ah above mentioned, it contains the Ain, which the Hebrew name does not. The English engineers found (Quar. Report of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1875, p. 15) an ancient site called Khîrbet Sanút (written with an Elif=N), situated immediately west of Khîrbet Yekin (the Cain of the context), which Tristram prefers as the representative of this Zanoah (Bible Places, p. 62).

In the genealogical lists of the tribe of Judah in 1 Chron., Jekuthiel is said to have been the father (i. e. founder or rebuild) of Zanoah (iv, 18); and, as far as the passage can be made out, some connection appears to be intended with "Bithiah, the daughter of Pharaoh." This mention of Bithiah probably points to some colonization of the place by Egyptians or by Israelites directly from Egypt. In Seetzen's account of Sanúte (Za'nútah) there is a curious token of the influence which events in Egypt still exercised on the place (Reisen, iii, 29). Here it is also mentioned with Socho and Eshtemoa, both of which places are recognisable in the neighborhood of Za'nútah. The Jewish interpreters considered the whole of this passage of 1 Chron. iv to refer to Moses, and interpret each of the names which it contains as titles of him. "He was chief of Zanoach," says the Targum, "because for his sake God put away (זָנוּחַ) the sins of Israel."

Zaph'nath-Paâne'ah (Heb. Tsapenath' Paane'ach, זַפְנָת פַּאנֵאחַ; Sept. Ψονδοφανήχ, Vulg. salvator mundi), a name given by Pharaoh to Joseph (Gen. xli, 45). See JOSEPH.

I. Form of the Word.—Various forms of this name, all traceable to the Hebrew or Sept. original, occur in the works of the early Jewish and Christian writers, chiefly Josephus, from different MSS. and editions of whose Antiquities (ii, 6, 1) no less than eleven forms have been collected following both originals, some variations being very corrupt; but from the translation given by Josephus it is probable that he transcribed the Hebrew. Philo (De Nominiū Mut. [ed. Col. 1613], p. 819 c) and Theodoret (i, 106, ed. Schulz) follow the Sept., and Jerome the Hebrew. The Coptic version nearly transcribes the Sept., psonthomphanek.

In the Hebrew text the name is divided into two parts. Every such division of Egyptian words being in accordance with the Egyptian orthography—as No-Ammon, Pi-beseth, Poti-Pherah—we cannot, if the name be Egyptian, reasonably propose any change in this case; if the name be Hebrew, the same is certain. There is no prima facie reason for any change in the consonants.

The Sept. form seems to indicate the same division, as the latter part, φανήχ, is identical with the second part of the Hebrew, while what precedes is different. There is again no prima facie reason for any change from the ordinary reading of the name. The cause of the difference from the Hebrew in the earlier part of the name must be discussed when we come to examine its meaning.

II. Proposed Etymologies of the Word.—This name has been explained as Hebrew or Egyptian, and always as a proper name. It has not been supposed to be an official title, but this possibility has to be considered.

1. The rabbins interpreted Zaphnath-paaneah as Hebrew, in the sense "revealer of a secret." This explanation is as old as Josephus (κρυπῶν εὐερίην, Ant. ii, 6, 1), and Theodoret also follows it (τῶν ἀποδόχων ἱμηνευτῶν, i, 106, Schulz). Philo offers an explanation, which, though seemingly different, may be the same (ἐν ἀποκρίσει στόμα κρινόν); but Mangey conjectures the true reading to be ἐν ἀποκρίσει στόμα ἀποκρινόμενον, loc. cit.). It must be remembered that Josephus perhaps, and Theodoret and Philo certainly, follow the Sept. form of the name. We dismiss the Hebrew interpretation as unsound in itself and demanding the improbable concession that Pharaoh gave Joseph a Hebrew name.

2. Isidore, though mentioning the Hebrew interpretations, remarks that the name should be Egyptian, and offers an Egyptian etymology: "Joseph . . . hunc Pharaon Zaphanath Phaanece appellavit, quod Hebraice absconditorum repertorem sonat . . . tamen quia hoc nomen ab Ægyptio ponitur, ipsius linguae debet habere rationem. Interpretatur ergo Zaphanath Phaanece Ægyptio sermone salvator mundi" (Orig. vii, 7, vol. iii, p. 327, Arev.). Jerome adopts the same rendering.

3. Modern scholars have looked to the Coptic for an explanation of this name, Jablonski and others proposing as the Coptic of the Egyptian original psot-m-phenet, etc., "the preservation (or preserver) of the age." This is evidently the etymology intended by Isidore and Jerome.—Smith. See Jablonski, Opusc. c. 207-216; Rosellini, Mon. Storici, i, 185; Champollion, Gramm. p. 380; Pezron, Lex. Copt. p. 207; Gesenius, Theaur. s. v.

III. Comparison with Egyptian Elements.—1. The Hebrew Form.—This, after eliminating the Masoretic vowels, is Z-ph-n-th P'-n-ch, which transcribed in hieroglyphics stands thus:

The first syllable, zuf, signifies "provisions;" the second, nat, is the preposition "of;" p is the definite article "the;" and the last syllable, anch, means "life." The whole name, therefore, may well be translated "food of the living."

2. The Septuagint Form.—This is more difficult of rendering. The most literal transcription of the Greek ψονδομανήχ, omitting the vowels as unessential, i. e. p-s-n-t-m-p-n-n-ch, would be in hieroglyphics thus:

This means "he who gives joy to the world," a sense evidently taken by Jerome in the Vulg., who lived while the Egyptian was yet vernacular, and who renders it "saviour of the world" (see the Speaker's Commentary [Amer. ed.], i, 480 sq.).

Za'phon (Heb. Tsaphon, צִפּוֹן, north, as often; Sept. Σαφών v. r. Σαφάν; Vulg. Saphon), the name of a place mentioned (in connection with Beth-aram, Beth-nimrah, and Succoth) in the enumeration of the allotment of the tribe of Gad (Josh. xiii, 27). It is one of the places in "the valley" (i. e. of the Jordan), which appear to have constituted the "remainder" (יִתְרֹם) of the kingdom of Sihon—apparently referring to the portion of the same kingdom previously allotted to Reuben (ver. 17-21). The enumeration appears to proceed from south to north, and from the mention of the Sea of Chinneroth it is natural to infer that Zaphon was near that lake. The Talmud (Gemara Jerusa. Shebiith, vi) identifies it with the ancient Amathus (q. v.), the remains of which are still called Amateh on Wady Rejib (Schwarz, Palest. p. 232), and this position is not an improbable one.

In Judg. xii, 1 the word rendered "northward" (tsaphónah) may with equal accuracy be rendered "to Zaphon." This rendering is supported by the Alexandrian copy of the Sept. (Κεφενά) and a host of other MSS., and it has consistency on its side, since the Ephraimites were marching eastward rather than northward. See JEPHTHAH.

Za'ra (Zapá), the Greek form (Matt. i, 3) of the Heb. name ZERAH (q. v.), the son of Judah.

Zara. See TALMUD.

Zar'aces (Zapáκης v. r. Zapaíos; Vulg. Zaraceles), a corrupt Greek form (1 Esdr. i, 38) of the Heb. name of the brother of Joacim (Jehoiakin), king of Judah, probably ZEDEKIAH (q. v.).

Za'rah (Gen. xxxviii, 30; xli, 12). See ZERAH.

Zara'as (Zapaiaç), the Greek form of ZERAHIAH (a, 1 Esdr. viii, 2; comp. Ezra vi, 1; b, 1 Esdr. viii, 31; comp. Ezra viii, 4) or (corruptly) ZERADIAH (1 Esdr. viii, 34; comp. Ezra viii, 8).

Za'reah (Neh. xi, 29). See ZORAH.

Za'reathite (1 Chron. ii, 53). See ZORATHITE.

Za're'd (Numb. xxi, 12). See ZERED.

Zar'ephath (Heb. Tsarephath, צָרְעָת, smelting place; Sept. and New Test. Σαρεπτά [in Obad. ra Sa-perrá; v. r. in 1 Kings, Σαρπτά; Josephus, Σαρεφθά; "Sarepta," Luke iv, 26), a town which derives its claim to notice from having been the residence of the prophet Elijah during the latter part of the drought, and where he performed the miracle of multiplying the barrel of meal and cruse of oil, and where he raised the widow's son to life (1 Kings xvii, 9, 10). Beyond stating that it was near to, or dependent on, Zidon (צִידֹן, צִידֹן), the Bible gives no clue to its position. It is mentioned by Obadiah (ver. 20), but merely as a Canaanitish (that is, Phœnician) city. Josephus (Ant. viii, 13, 2), however, states that it was "not far from Sidon and Tyre, for it lies between them." To this Jerome adds (Onomast. s. v. "Sarepta") that it "lay on the public road," that is, the coast-road. Both these conditions are implied in the mention of it in the itinerary of Paula by Jerome (Epist. Paula, § 8), and both are fulfilled in the situation of the modern village of Surafend, a name which, except in its termination, is almost identical with the ancient Phœnician (comp. Pliny, v, 17; Jerome, Ep. 108, ad Eustoch.). There were many vineyards there (Sidon. Apoll. Carm. xvii, 16; Fulgent. Mythol. ii, 15). The Crusaders made Sarepta a Latin bishopric in the archiepiscopate of Sidon, and erected near the port a small chapel over the reputed site of Elijah's miracle (William of Tyre, xix, 14; Jacob of Vitry, ch. xlii). In the Middle Ages it was a strongly fortified place (Wilken, Kreuzzüge, ii, 208). The locality has been visited and described in recent times by Robinson (Bibl. Res. ii, 475), Thomson (Land and Book, ch. xii), and others. It appears to have changed its place, at least since the 11th century, for it is now more than a mile from the coast, high up on the slope of a hill (Robinson, p. 474), whereas at the time of the Crusades it was on the shore. Of the old town considerable indications remain. One group of foundations is on a headland called Ain el-Kentarah; but the chief remains are south of this, and extend for a mile or more, with many fragments of columns, slabs, and other architectural features. The Roman road is said to be unusually perfect there (Beaumont, Diary, etc., ii, 186). The site of the chapel erected by the Crusaders on the spot then reputed to be the site of the widow's house is probably still preserved (see the citations of Robinson). It is near the water's edge, and is now marked by a wely and small khan dedicated to el-Khudr, the well-known personage who unites, in the popular Moslem faith, Elijah and St. George. A grotto at the foot of the hill on which the modern village stands is now shown as the residence of Elijah (Van de Velde, Syr. and Palest. i, 102). See MAUN-

Ruins at Surafend.

place in the tribe of Reuben, situated in the mountain ha-Emek (A. V. "Mount of the Valley"), i. e. in the abrupt edge of the Jordan or Dead Sea valley (Josh. xiii, 19, where it is mentioned between Sibmah and Bethpeor). Seetzen (Reisen, ii, 369) proposes to identify it with a spot called Sará at the mouth of the Wady Zerk Main, about a mile from the edge of the Dead Sea. In this Tristram coincides, and he describes the spot as being in keeping with its poetical name, "the inconsiderable ruins of Zara" occupying a little oasis embayed in the shore of the sea, where the river runs through steep banks shaded by oleanders and palms, with numerous hot and somewhat sulphurous springs (Bible Places, p. 351). A place Shakur is marked on Van de Velde's map, about six miles south of es-Salt, at the head of the valley of the Wady Seir, which might possibly represent the latter part of the name more exactly.

Zar'etan (Heb. Tsarethan, צָרֶתָן, perhaps splendor; in Josh. Sept. wholly omits; Vulg. Sarthan; in 1 Kings vii, 46 Sept. Σαράμ v. r. Σαρά; Vulg. Sarthan; A. V. "Zarthan;" with 7 directive, Zarethand-nah, זָרְתָּנָה, in iv, 12; Sept. Σαράν v. r. Σαπαράν and Ἐσθιανθάν; Vulg. Sarthana; A. V. "Zartanah"), a town or locality mentioned by this name three times, and apparently several times also under similar names. It is first named in the account of the passage of the Jordan by the Israelites (Josh. iii, 16) as defining the position of the city Adam, which was beside (בְּצִדָּה) it. It is next mentioned in the list of Solomon's commissariat districts as "close to" (בְּצִדָּה) Bethshean, that is, in the upper part of the Jordan valley and "beneath" (בְּתַחַת) Jezreel (1 Kings iv, 12). It is again mentioned in connection with Succoth as a clayey place where Solomon cast metal in the circle (בְּכִכָּר, kikkár, "plain," i. e. ghór) of the Jordan (vii, 46). In the parallel passage to this last (2 Chron. iv, 17) ZEREDATHAH (q. v.) is substituted for Zarthan, and this again is not impossibly identical with the ZERERAH (q. v.) of the story of Gideon (Judg. vii, 22). All these spots agree in proximity to the Jordan, and the associated places somewhat aid us in discovering the general locality. Bethshean is the present Beisan, Succoth is probably the present Salkut, and Adam is, doubtless, represented by the modern Adamieh ford. Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 354) inclines to identify Zaretan with Surtabah, a lofty and isolated hill which projects from the main highlands into the Jordan valley, about seventeen miles north of Jericho (comp. De Sauley, Dead Sea, ii, 31); but the names are not closely alike, and this peak has another ancient appellation. See SARTABA. Schwarz probably refers to the same spot when he declares that the name should be read Sartaph, and that the town in question was so called "because it lay near Mount Sartaf, five English miles west of the Jordan" (Palest. p. 162). Mr. Drake (in the Quar. Report of the "Palestine Explor. Fund," Jan. 1875, p. 31) thinks that the reading Siaram (Σαράμ) of the Alexandrian MS. at 1 Kings vii, 46 points to a "Tell Sarem, a very conspicuous and unusually large mound three miles south of Beisan;" but this reading is very precarious. According to Tristram (Bible Places, p. 228), "the name lingers in Ain Zahrah and Tulkil Zahrah, three miles west of Beisan, indicating that Zaretan was the designation of a district rather than a place."

Za'reth-sha'har (Heb. Tse'reth hash-Sha'char, צָרֶת הַשָּׁחַר, splendor of the dawn; Sept. Σάρθ και Σάω v. r. Σαπάδα και Σάων; Vulg. Sereth Assahur), a place in the tribe of Reuben, situated in the mountain ha-Emek (A. V. "Mount of the Valley"), i. e. in the abrupt edge of the Jordan or Dead Sea valley (Josh. xiii, 19, where it is mentioned between Sibmah and Bethpeor). Seetzen (Reisen, ii, 369) proposes to identify it with a spot called Sará at the mouth of the Wady Zerk Main, about a mile from the edge of the Dead Sea. In this Tristram coincides, and he describes the spot as being in keeping with its poetical name, "the inconsiderable ruins of Zara" occupying a little oasis embayed in the Zar'hite (Heb. Zarchi, זָרְחִי, Sept. Ζαρά v. r. Ζαρά, A. V. "Zarhites"), the patronymic of the family of Zerah son of Judah (Numb. xxvi, 20; Josh. vii, 17; 1 Chron. xxvii, 11, 13), and also of that descended from Zerah son of Simeon (Numb. xxvi, 18).

Zar'tanah [some Zarta'nah] (1 Kings iv, 12). See ZARETAN.

Zar'than (1 Kings vii, 46). See ZARETAN.

Zath'oë (Sept. Ζαθούϊ; Vulg. Zachues), a Greek form (1 Esdr. viii, 32) of the Heb. name ZATTU (which is apparently omitted in Ezra vii, 5).

Zathu'i (Sept. Ζαθούϊ v. r. Ζαρού; Vulg. Demu), a Greek form (1 Esdr. v, 12) of the Heb. name (Ezra ii, 8) ZATTU (q. v.).

Zat'hu (Neh. x, 14). See ZATTU.

Zat'tu (Heb. Zattu, זָטָה, pleasant; Sept. Ζαθούϊ v. r. Ζαθούϊ, Zar'zová, etc.; Vulg. Zethua, Zethu), an Israelite whose "sons" to the number of 945 (or 845) returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 8; Neh. vii, 13); and another company of them returned with Ezra, although his name has accidentally dropped out of the text in Ezra viii, 5, as we learn from the Sept. and the Apocryphal parallel (1 Esdr. viii, 32), which both read "of the sons of Zathoë, Zechenias son of Aziel [or Jezelus]"—(Keil, Comment. ad loc.). B.C. ante 536. Several of these descendants renounced their Gentile wives (Ezra x, 27).

Za'van (1 Chron. i, 42). See ZAAVAN.

Zayit. See OLIVE.

Za'za (Heb. Zaza, זָזָא, perhaps projection; Sept. Ζαζάν v. r. Οζαζά, Οζζάμ, etc.; Vulg. Ziza), last named of the two sons of Jonathan of the family of Jerahmeel the Judahite (1 Chron. ii, 33). B.C. post 1618.

Zebachim. See TALMUD.

Zebadi'ah (Heb. Zebaayah, זְבַדְיָה, [thrice in the prolonged form Zebadya'hu, זְבַדְיָהוּ, 1 Chron. xxvi, 2; 2 Chron. xvii, 8; xix, 11], gift of Jehovah; Sept. Ζαβὰδία or Ζαβὰδιος v. r. Ζαβδίας or Ζαβδία, etc.), the name of several Israelites. Comp. ZABDIEL.

1. A Benjamite of the "sons" of Beriah (1 Chron. viii, 15). B.C. cir. 1618.

2. A Benjamite of the "sons" of Elpaal (1 Chron. viii, 17). B.C. cir. 1618.

3. One of the two sons of Jeroham of Gedor, a Benjamite who joined the fortunes of David in his retreat at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 7). B.C. 1054.

4. A Levite, third son of Meshelemiah the Korhite (1 Chron. xxvi, 2). B.C. 1043.

5. Son of Asahel (Joab's brother), and commander with his father of the fourth contingent of David's troops (1 Chron. xxvii, 7). B.C. 1014.

6. One of the two Levites who were sent with others in the third year of Jehoshaphat to teach the law in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii, 8). B.C. 910.

7. The son of Ishmael and prince of the house of Judah in the reign of Jehoshaphat, who, in conjunction with Amariah the chief priest, was appointed to the superintendence of the Levites, priests and chief men who had to decide all causes, civil and ecclesiastical, which were brought before them (2 Chron. xix, 11). B.C. 895. They possibly may have formed a kind of court of appeal, Zebadiah acting for the interests of the king, and Amariah being the supreme authority in ecclesiastical matters.

8. Son of Michael of the "sons" of Shephatiah, who returned with Ezra from Babylon with eighty male relatives (Ezra viii, 8). B.C. 459.

9. A priest of the "sons" of Immer, who divorced his Gentile wife married after the Exile (Ezra x, 20). B.C. 458.

Ze'bah (Heb. Ze'bach, זֶבַח, sacrifice, as often; Sept. Zeβéi; Josephus, Zeβij; Vulg. Zeebe), first named of the two "kings" of Midian who appear to have commanded the great invasion of Palestine, and who finally fell by the hand of Gideon himself. B.C. 1361. He is always coupled with Zalmunna, and is mentioned in Judg. viii, 5-21; Psa. lxxxi, 11). See ZALMUNNA.

It is a remarkable instance of the unconscious artlessness of the narrative contained in Judg. vi, 38-viii, 28 that no mention is made of any of the chiefs of the Midianites during the early part of the story, or indeed until Gideon actually comes into contact with them. We then discover (viii, 18) that while the Bedawin were ravaging the crops in the valley of Jezreel, before Gideon's attack, three or more of his brothers had been captured by the Arabs and put to death by the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna themselves. But this material fact is only incidentally mentioned, and is of a piece with the later references by prophets and psalmists to other events in the same struggle, the interest and value of which have been alluded to under OREB (q. v.).

Psa. lxxxiii, 12 purports to have preserved the very words of the cry with which Zebah and Zalmunna rushed up at the head of their hordes from the Jordan into the luxuriant growth of the great plain—"Seize these goodly pastures!"

While Oreb and Zeeb, two of the inferior leaders of the incursion, had been slain, with a vast number of their people, by the Ephraimites at the central fords of the Jordan (not improbably those near Jisr Damieh), the two kings had succeeded in making their escape by a passage farther to the north (probably the ford near Bethshean), and thence by the Wady Yabis, through Gilead, to Karkor, a place which is not fixed, but which lay doubtless high up on the Hauran. Here they were reposing with 15,000 men, a mere remnant of their huge horde, when Gideon overtook them. Had they resisted, there is little doubt that they might have easily overcome the little band of "fainting" heroes who had toiled after them up the tremendous passes of the mountains; but the name of Gideon was still full of terror, and the Bedawin were entirely unprepared for his attack: they fled in dismay, and the two kings were taken. See GIDEON.

Then came the return down the long defiles leading to the Jordan. We see the cavalcade of camels, jingling the golden chains and the crescent-shaped collars or trappings hung round their necks. High aloft rode the captive chiefs clad in their brilliant kefyehs and embroidered abbayahs, and with their "collars" or "jewels" in nose and ear, on neck and arm. Gideon probably strode on foot by the side of his captives. They passed Penuel, where Jacob had seen the vision of the face of God; they passed Succoth; they crossed the rapid stream of the Jordan; they ascended the highlands west of the river, and at length reached Ophrah, the native village of their captor (Josephus, Ant. v, 6, 5). Then, at last, the question which must have been on Gideon's tongue during the whole of the return found a vent. There is no appearance of its having been alluded to before, but it gives, as nothing else could, the key to the whole pursuit. It was the death of his brothers, "the children of his mother," that had supplied the personal motive for that steady perseverance, and had led Gideon on to his goal against hunger, faintness, and obstacles of all kinds. "What manner of men were they which ye slew at Tabor?" Up to this time the sheiks may have believed that they were reserved for ransom; but these words once spoken, there can have been no doubt what their fate was to be. They met it like noble children of the desert, without fear or weakness. One request alone they make—that they may die by the sure blow of the hero himself—"and Gideon arose and slew them;" and not till he had revenged his brothers did any thought of plunder enter his heart—then, and not till then, did he lay hands on the treasures which ornamented their camels. See MIDIANITE.

Zeba'im (Heb. with the art. hats-Tsebatim, הַצִּבְיִים, the gazelles, as often; Sept. vioi 'Aseβewim v. r. 'Aseβewiv; Vulg. Aseba'im; in Neh. hats-Tsebayim, הַצִּבְיִים; Sept. vioi Zaβaεiv; Vulg. Saba'im), apparently the name of the native place of the "sons of Pochereth," who are mentioned in the catalogue of the families of "Solomon's slaves" as having returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 57; Neh. vii, 59). On the other hand, the compound name Pochereth hat-Tseba'im is considered by some to have no reference to place, but to signify the "snarer or hunter of roes" (Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 1102 b; Bertheau, Exeg. Handb. Ezra ii, 57), designating doubtless an individual. See POCHERETH.

Zeb'edee, or rather ZEBEDÆ'US (Ζεβεδᾶιος, the Greek form apparently of Zubti or Zebedah), a fisherman of Galilee, the father of the apostles James the Great and John (Matt. iv, 21), and the husband of Salome (xxvii, 56; Mark xv, 40). He probably lived either at Bethsaida or in its immediate neighborhood. It has been inferred from the mention of his "hired servants" (i, 20), and from the acquaintance with the apostle John and Annas the high-priest (John xviii, 15), that the family of Zebedee were in easy circumstances (comp. xix, 27), although not above manual labor (Matt. iv, 21). While the name of Zebedee frequently occurs as a patronymic, for the sake of distinguishing his two sons from others who bore the same names, he appears only once in the Gospel narrative—namely, in Matt. iv, 21, 22; Mark i, 19, 20—where he is seen in his boat with his two sons mending their nets. A.D. 26. On this occasion he allows his sons to leave him, at the bidding of the Saviour, without raising any objection, although it does not appear that he was himself ever of the number of Christ's disciples. His wife, indeed, appears in the catalogue of the pious women who were in constant attendance on the Saviour towards the close of his ministry, who watched him on the cross, and ministered to him even in the grave (Matt. xxvii, 55, 56; Mark xv, 40; xvi, 1; comp. Matt. xx, 20; Luke viii, 3). It is reasonable to infer that Zebedee was dead before this time. See JOHN (the Apostle).

Zebi'na (Heb. Zebina', זִבְינָה, purchase; Sept. Zaβiviv v. r. Zeβevrác; Vulg. Zabina), one of the "sons" of Nebo, who divorced his Gentile wife taken after the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 43). B.C. 458.

Zebina. See ALEXANDER.

Zebol'im (Gen. xiv, 2, 8). See ZEBOIM.

Zebo'im, a name which occurs in two distinct forms in the original, denoting different localities.

1. (Heb. Tseboim', צֶבֹאִים, gazelles, as often, Hos. xi, 8; or shorter, Tseboyim', צֶבֹיִם [marg. צֶבֹיִים], Gen. x, 19; or צֶבִירִים [marg. צֶבֹיִים], xiv, 2, 8 [A. V. "Zebolim"]; Deut. xxix, 23; Sept. Σεβωειμ v. r. Σεβωειμ; Vulg. Zeboim), one of the five cities destroyed by divine visitation in the vale of Siddim (Hos. xi, 8), mentioned immediately after Admah (Gen. x, 19; Deut. xxix, 23), and ruled over by a separate king, Shemeber (Gen. xiv, 2, 8). De Saulcy finds the site of Zebolim in the Taláa Sebáan, a name which he reports as attached to extensive ruins on the high ground between the Dead Sea and Kerak (Dead Sea, i, 383); but the position as well as the elevation is improbable, and the ancient spot is most likely beneath the water of the southern bay of the sea. See SODOM; ZOAR.

2. (Heb. with the art. hats-Tsebo'im', הַצֶּבֹאִים, the hyenas; Sept. Zapativ v. r. Σαβίμ, Σεβωειμ, etc.; Vulg. Seboim), the name of a valley (צֶבִי, i. e. a ravine or gorge, apparently east of Michmash, mentioned in 1 Sam. xiii, 18, where it is described with a curious minuteness, which is unfortunately no longer intelligible. The road running from Michmash to the east is specified as "the road of the border that looketh to the ravine of Zebolim towards the wilderness." The wilderness (midbar) is no doubt the district of uncultivated mountain tops and sides which lies between the central district of Benjamin and the Jordan valley, and here apparently the ravine of Zebolim should be sought. In that very district there is a wild gorge, bearing the name of Shuk ed-Dubi, "ravine of the hyena," up which runs the path from Jericho to Mukhmas (Conder, Tent Work in Palest. iii, 16). It is represented on the new Ordnance Map as running for a short distance N.E. of Ain Dûk. The same place or a town adjacent seems to be mentioned in Neh. xi, 34 (where it occurs without the art. prefixed)—confounding it, nevertheless, with the Zebolim of Genesis—as occupied after the Captivity. Rabbi Schwarz, however, maintains that the two places are different, and, while locating the valley as above (Palest. p. 156), he identifies the Zebolim of Nehemiah with "the village Zuba, situated on a high mount, three English miles west of Jerusalem" (ibid. p. 134). He adds, "In [the Talmudical tract] Challah, iv, 10 is mentioned the Mount Zebolim." He doubtless refers to the ruined village Soba, about six miles west of Jerusalem, near Esh-taol; but this has little probability.

Zebub. See FLY.

Zebu'dah (Heb. Zebidah', זֶבִידָה; marg. Zebu'dah', זֶבִידָה, bestowed; Sept. Ἰελεδάφ v. r. Εἰλεδάφ, Ἰελλά, etc.; Vulg. Zebida), the daughter of Pedaiash of Rumah, wife of Josiah and mother of king Jehoiakim (2 Kings xxiii, 36). B.C. 633.

Ze'bul (Heb. Zebul', זֶבֻל, habitation; Sept. Ζεβούλ; Josephus, Ζέβουλος), the chief man (שֹׂרֵר, A. V. "ruler") of the city of Shechem at the time of the contest between Abimelech and the native Canaanites (Judg. ix, 28, 30, 36, 38, 41). B.C. 1319. He governed the town as the "officer" (פֶּקִידָה; Sept. ἐπίσκοπος; Josephus, ζῆνός [A. V. v. 7, 4]) of Abimelech while the latter was absent; and he took part against the Canaanites by shutting them out of the city when Abimelech was encamped outside it. His conversation with Gaal, the Canaanitish leader, as they stood in the gate of Shechem watching the approach of the armed bands, gives Zebul a certain individuality among the many characters of that time of confusion. See ABIMELECH.

Zeb'ulonite (Heb. Zebuloni', זֶבֻלֹנִי; Sept. Ζαβουλωνίτης v. r. Ζαβουνίτης), the patronymic designation of a member of the tribe of Zebulun (Numb. xxvi, 27, "Zebulunite;" Judg. xii, 11, 12).

Zeb'ulun (Heb. Zebulun', once [Judg. i, 30] fully זֶבֻלֹן, usually זֶבֻלִין or [Gen. xxx, 20; xxxv, 23; xlv, 14; Judg. iv, 6; v, 18; vi, 25; 1 Chron. ii, 1; vi, 68, 77; xii, 33, 40; 2 Chron. xxx, 10, 11, 18; Psa. lxxviii, 27; Isa. ix, 1] זֶבֻלִין, habitation; Sept., New Test., and Josephus, Ζαβουλών; Vulg. Zabulon; A. V. "Zabulon," Matt. iv, 13, 15; Rev. vii, 8), the name of a man and of the tribe descended from him, and also of a city in Palestine.

1. The sixth and last son of Leah, and the tenth born to Jacob (Gen. xxxv, 23; xlv, 14; 1 Chron. ii, 1). His birth is recorded in Gen. xxx, 19, 20, where the origin of the name is, as usual, ascribed to an exclamation of his mother—"Now will my husband dwell with me (yizbeleni), for I have borne him six sons!" and she called his name Zebulun." B.C. 1914. This paronomasia is not preserved in the original of the "Blessing of Jacob," though the language of the A. V. implies it. The word rendered "dwell" in xlix, 18 is יָשַׁן, with no relation to the name Zebulun. The Sept. puts a different point on the exclamation of Leah: "My husband will choose me" (αἰσείρει με). This, however, hardly implies any difference in the original text. Josephus (Ant. i, 19, 8) gives only a general explanation: "a pledge of goodwill towards her." In the order of birth, Zebulun followed his brother Issachar, with whom, in the history of the tribes and in their allotted territories in Canaan, he was closely connected (Deut. xxxiii, 18). His personal history does not appear to have contained a single incident worthy of record; and his name is not once mentioned except in the genealogical lists. In the Jewish traditions he is named as the first of the five who were presented by Joseph to Pharaoh—Dan, Naphtali, Gad, and Asher being the others (Targ. Pseudo-Jon. On Gen. xlvii, 2).

At the time of the descent of Jacob into Egypt, Zebulun had three sons—Sered, Elon, and Jahleel (Gen. xlv, 14)—who became the founders of the three great families into which the tribe was divided (Numb. xxvi, 26). Though the first generation was so small, this tribe ranked fourth in numbers among the twelve, when the census was taken at Mount Sinai, in the year of the Exode; Judah, Dan, and Simeon being more numerous. During the wilderness journey it increased from 57,400 males to 60,500; but it held just the same relative place among the twelve—Judah, Dan, and Issachar being before it when the census was made on the plains of Moab (ver. 27).

History is almost as silent regarding the acts of the tribe during the long period of Egyptian bondage and the desert march as it is regarding the patriarch Zebulun himself. During the journey from Egypt to Palestine, the tribe of Zebulun formed one of the first camp, with Judah and Issachar (also sons of Leah), marching under the standard of Judah. The head of the tribe at Sinai was Eliab son of Helon (Numb. vii, 24); at Shiloh, Elizaphan son of Parnach (xxxiv, 25). Its representative among the spies was Gaddiel son of Sodi (xiii, 10). The only point worthy of note previous to its settlement in Palestine is the fact that, on the solemn proclamation of the law, Zebulun was among the six tribes stationed on Mount Ebal to pronounce the curses (Deut. xxvii, 18).

The position and physical character of Zebulun's destined territory in the Land of Promise had been sketched in the prophetic blessings of Jacob and Moses. Looking down into a far-distant age, Jacob exclaimed, as his son stood by his bedside, "Zebulun shall dwell on the shore (חֹפִי, chôph, a core, the modern Haifa) of seas; and he shall be for a shore of ships; and his side will be to Zidon" (Gen. xlix, 13). Though Issachar was an elder brother, Jacob seems to have already noticed and acknowledged the political superiority of Zebulun by placing him first in order. This superiority was afterwards more fully displayed in the blessing of Moses, which, though embracing both tribes, appears as if addressed to Zebulun alone—"And of Zebulun he said, Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out; and, Issachar, in thy tents. They shall call the people unto the mountain; there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness; for they shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand" (Deut. xxxiii, 18, 19). Zebulun's territory was one of the richest and most beautiful sections of Western Palestine. Its allotment was the third of the second distribution (Josh. xix, 10). Joshua defines its borders with his usual minuteness, though, in consequence of the disappearance of many old cities, it cannot now be entirely identified. Its position, however, and general extent, are clear enough. Asher and Naphtali bounded it on the north, and Issachar on the south. It stretched nearly across the country from the Sea of Galilee on the east, to the maritime plain of Phœnicia on the west; embracing a strip of Esdraelon, a little of the plain of Akka, the whole of the rich upland plain of Battauf (equal in fertility, and almost equal in extent, to that of Jezreel, and with the immense advantage of not being, as that was, the high-road of the Bedawin); with a part of the fertile tableland between it and the great basin of the Sea of Galilee; and, last, not least, it included sites so strongly fortified by nature that in the later struggles of the nation they proved more impregnable than any in the whole country. The sacred vicinity of Tabor, Zebulun appears to have shared with Issachar (Deut. xxxiii, 19), and it and Rimmon were allotted to the Merarite Levites (1 Chron. vi, 77). The beautiful wooded hills and ridges extending from Tabor, by Nazareth and Sefuriyeh, to the plain of Akka, were also in Zebulun. It touched Carmel on the south-west; and though it did not actually reach to the shore of the Mediterranean, its sides joined the narrow maritime territory of Phœnicia, to which Jacob, according to common Eastern custom, gives the name of its chief city, Zidon—"And his side (צִדְוֹן, thigh, i. e. flank) will be to Zidon." Its opposite extremity resting on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, the words of Jacob were fulfilled: "Zebulun shall dwell on the coast of seas." His fishermen on the Sea of Galilee, and his merchants navigating the Mediterranean, in company with their Phœnician neighbors, illustrate remarkably the other blessings: "He shall be for a shore of ships;" "he shall rejoice in his goings out." Possessing thus a rich agricultural country, abundance of wood, and an outlet for commercial enterprise, both in the Mediterranean and in the Sea of Galilee, the future state and history of Zebulun were influenced and moulded by external circumstances. The four Northern tribes—Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, and Naphtali—were in a great measure isolated from their brethren. The plain of Esdraelon, almost unceasingly swept by the incursions of hostile nations, separated them from Ephraim and Judah; while the deep Jordan valley formed a barrier on the east. Isolation from their brethren, and their peculiar position, threw them into closer intercourse with their Gentile neighbors—the old mountaineers whom they were never able entirely to expel (Judg. i, 30), and especially the commercial Phœnicians. Their national exclusiveness was thus considerably modified; their manners and customs were changed; their language gradually assumed a foreign tone and accent (Matt. xxvi, 73); and even their religion lost much of its original purity (2 Chron. xxx, 10, 18). "Galilee of the Gentiles" and its degenerate inhabitants came at length to be regarded with distrust and scorn by the haughty people of Judah (Isa. ix, 1; Matt. iv, 15; xxvi, 73).

The four Northern tribes formed, as it were, a state by themselves (Stanley, Jewish Church, i, 266); and among them Zebulun became distinguished for warlike spirit and devotion. In the great campaign and victory of Barak it bore a prominent part (Judg. iv, 6, 10). Deborah, in her triumphal ode, says, "Zebulun and Naphtali were a people that jeopardied their lives unto the death in the high places of the field" (v, 18). It would appear, besides, that their commercial enterprise led them to a closer and fuller study of the arts and sciences than their brethren. "They thus at an early period acquired the reputation of literary accomplishment; and the poet sang of them, 'From Zebulun are the men who handle the pen of the scribe'" (ver. 14; Kalisch, On Genesis, p. 753). One of these scribes may have been Elon, the single judge produced by the tribe, who is recorded as having held office for ten years (Judg. xii, 11, 12). This combination of warlike spirit with scientific skill seems to be referred to once again in a more extended field of action. The sacred historian mentions that in David's army there were, "Of Zebulun, such as went forth to battle, expert in war, with all instruments of war, fifty thousand, which could keep rank; not of double heart" (1 Chron. xii, 33). They were generous, also, and liberal, as well as brave and loyal; for they contributed abundantly of the rich products of their country—meal, figs, raisins, wine, oil, oxen, and sheep—to the wants of the army (ver. 40). The head of the tribe at this time was Ishmaiah ben-Obadiah (xxvii, 19). The "way of the sea" (Isa. ix, 1), the great road from Damascus to the Mediterranean, traversed a good portion of the territory of Zebulun, and must have brought its people into contact with the merchants and the commodities of Syria, Phœnicia, and Egypt. Its inhabitants, in consequence, took part in seafaring concerns (Josephus, Ant. v, i, 22). In the Testament of Zebulun (Fabricius, Pseudepigr. V. T. i, 630-645) great stress is laid on his skill in fishing, and he is commemorated as the first to navigate a skiff on the sea. It is satisfactory to reflect that the very latest mention of the Zebulunites is the account of the visit of a large number of them to Jerusalem to the passover of Hezekiah, when, by the enlightened liberality of the king, they were enabled to eat the feast, even though, through long neglect of the provisions of the law, they were not cleansed in the manner prescribed by the ceremonial law (2 Chron. xxx, 10, 11, 18).

The tribe of Zebulun, though not mentioned, appears to have shared the fate of the other Northern tribes at the invasion of the country by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xvii, 18, 24 sq.). From this time the history of distinct tribes ceases. With the exception of the Levites, the whole were amalgamated into one nation; and, on the return from exile, were called Jews. The land of Zebulun, however, occupied a distinguished place in New-Test. times. It formed the chief scene of our Lord's life and labors. Nazareth and Cana were in it; and it embraced a section of the shore of the Sea of Galilee, where so many of the miracles of Christ were performed, and so many of his discourses and parables spoken. Then was fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah: "The land Zabulon, and the land Nephthaim, the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles: the people which sat in darkness saw great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death, light is sprung up" (ix, 1, 2; Matt. iv, 15, 16). In the visions of Ezekiel (xlvi, 26-33) and of John (Rev. vii, 8) this tribe finds its due mention. See ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.

Shimron.	do. Semunieh?

2. A place on the eastern border of the tribe of Asher, between Beth-dagon and the valley of Jiphthah-el (Josh. xix, 27); perhaps the modern Abilin, a village "perched upon a high and sharp hill, on the south side of the wady of the same name" (Robinson, Later Res. p. 103). In this passage the word has usually been regarded as referring to the tribe by that name, as if Asher's boundary at this point coincided with that of Zebulun, whereas they were identical along the whole line named. See TRIBE.

Zeb'ulunite (Numb. xxvi, 27). See ZEBULONITE.

Zechari'ah (Heb. Zekaryah, זְכַרְיָה, remembered of Jehovah; occasionally [1 Chron. v, 7; xv, 18, 24; xxiv, 25; xxvi, 2, 11, 14; xxvii, 21; 2 Chron. xx, 14; xxi, 2; xxvi, 5; xxix, 18; xxxv, 8] in the prolonged form Zekarya'hu, זְכַרְיָהּ; Sept., N. T., and Josephus, Zacharias), the name of many Hebrews, besides Zacharias (q. v.), the father of John the Baptist.

1. (Sept. Zachōup v. r. Zachōup.) Ninth named of the ten sons of Jehiel, the father or founder of Gibeon (1 Chron. ix, 37). B.C. cir. 1618. In 1 Chron. viii, 31 he is called ZACHER (q. v.).

2. Son of Meshelemiah, or Shelemiah, a Korhite, and keeper of the north gate of the tabernacle of the congregation (1 Chron. ix, 21) in the arrangement of the porters in the reign of David. B.C. 1043. In 1 Chron. xxvi, 2, 14, he is described as "one counselling with understanding."

3. A Levite in the Temple band as arranged by David, appointed to play "with psalteries on Alamoth" (1 Chron. xv, 20; comp. xvi, 5). He was of the second order of Levites (xv, 18), a porter or gate-keeper, and may possibly be the same as the preceding or the following.

4. One of the priests who blew with the trumpets in the procession which accompanied the ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. xv, 24). B.C. 1043.

5. Son of Ieshiah, or Jesiah, a Kohathite Levite descended from Uzziel (1 Chron. xxiv, 25). B.C. 1043.

6. Fourth son of Hosah of the children of Merari (1 Chron. xxvi, 11). B.C. 1043.

7. (Sept. Zadaiaç v. r. Zaßdiaç.) A Manassite, whose son Iddo was chief of his tribe in Gilead in the reign of David (1 Chron. xxvii, 21). B.C. 1014.

8. The son of Benaiah and father of Jahaziel, which last was a Gershonite Levite in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx, 14). B.C. ante 912.

9. Third named of the five princes of Judah in the reign of Jehoshaphat who were sent with priests and Levites to teach the people the law of Jehovah (2 Chron. xvii, 7). B.C. 910.

10. Fourth named of the seven sons of king Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xxi, 2). B.C. 887.

11. (Sept. Azapiac.) Son of the high-priest Jehoiada, in the reign of Joash, king of Judah (2 Chron. xxiv, 20), and therefore the king's cousin. B.C. 838. After the death of Jehoiada, Zechariah probably succeeded to his office, and in attempting to check the reaction in favor of idolatry which immediately followed, he fell a victim to a conspiracy formed against him by the king, and was stoned with stones in the court of the Temple. His dying cry was not that of the first Christian martyr, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge" (Acts vii, 60), but, "The Lord look upon it, and require it" (2 Chron. xxiv, 20-22). The memory of this unrighteous deed lasted long in Jewish tradition. In the Jerusalem Talmud (Taanith, fol. 69, quoted by Lightfoot, Temple Service, ch. xxxvi) there is a legend told of eighty thousand young priests who were slain by Nebuzardan for the blood of Zechariah, and the evident hold which the story had taken upon the minds of the people renders it probable that "Zacharias son of Barachias," who was slain between the Temple and the altar (Matt. xxiii, 35), is the same with Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, and that the name of Barachias as his father crept into the text from a marginal gloss, the writer confusing this Zechariah either with Zechariah the prophet, who was the son of Berechiah, or with another Zechariah, the son of Jeberchiah (Isa. viii, 2). See Casteus, De Zacharia Berechia Filio (Lips. 1720); Huth, Cædes Abelis et Zacharias (Erlang. 1756); and the Stud. u. Krit. 1841, ii, 678. See ZACHARIAS.

12. A prophet in the reign of Uzziah who appears to have acted as the king's counsellor, but of whom nothing is known (2 Chron. xxvi, 5). B.C. 807. The chronicler in describing him makes use of a most remarkable and unique expression—"Zechariah, who understood the seeing of God," or, as our A. V. has it, "who had understanding in the visions of God" (comp. Dan. i, 17). As no such term is ever employed elsewhere in the description of any prophet, it has been questioned whether the reading of the received text is the true one. The Sept., Targum, Syriac, Arabic, Rashi, and Kimchi, with many of Kennicott's MSS., read בִּירְאָה, "in the fear of," for בִּירְאִית, and their reading is most probably the correct one.—Smith.

13. (Sept. Ζαχαρία.) A chief of the Reubenites at the time of the captivity by Tiglath-pileser (1 Chron. v, 7). B.C. cir. 740.

14. The father of Abijah, or Abi, Hezekiah's mother (2 Chron. xxix, 1); mentioned also in 2 Kings xviii, 2 (Sept. Ζαχαρίας, A. V. "Zachariah"). B.C. ante 726.

15. Second named of the "sons" of Asaph the minstrel, who in the reign of Hezekiah took part with other Levites in the purification of the Temple (2 Chron. xxix, 13). B.C. 726.

16. The son of Jeberechiah, who was taken by the prophet Isaiah as one of the "faithful witnesses to record," when he wrote concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz (Isa. viii, 2). B.C. 728. He was not the same as Zechariah the prophet, who lived in the time of Uzziah and died before that king, but he may have been the Levite of that name who in the reign of Hezekiah assisted in the purification of the Temple (2 Chron. xxix, 18). As Zechariah the prophet is called the son of Berechiah, with which Jeberechiah is all but identical, Bertholdt (Einleit. iv, 1722, 1727) conjectured that some of the prophecies attributed to him, at any rate ch. ix-xi, were really the production of Zechariah, the contemporary of Isaiah, and were appended to the volume of the later prophet of the same name (Gesenius, Der Proph. Jesai. i, 327). Another conjecture is that Zechariah the son of Jeberechiah is the same as Zechariah the father of Abijah, the queen of Ahaz (Poli Synopsis, ad loc.); the witnesses summoned by Isaiah being thus men of the highest ecclesiastical and civil rank.

17. The son of Jeroboam II, being the fourteenth king of Israel, and the last of the house of Jehu. There is a difficulty about the date of his reign. We are told that Amaziah ascended the throne of Judah in the second year of Joash king of Israel, and reigned 29 years (2 Kings xiv, 1, 2). He was succeeded by Uzziah or Azariah in the 27th year of Jeroboam II, the successor of Joash (xv, 1), and Uzziah reigned 52 years. On the other hand, Joash king of Israel reigned 16 years (xiii, 10), was succeeded by Jeroboam, who reigned 41 years (xiv, 23), and he by Zechariah, who came to the throne in the 38th year of Uzziah king of Judah (xv, 8). Thus we have (1) from the accession of Amaziah to the 38th of Uzziah  $29 + 38 = 67$  years; but (2) from the second year of Joash to the accession of Zechariah (or at least to the death of Jeroboam) we have  $15 + 41 = 56$  years. Further, the accession of Uzziah, placed in the 27th year of Jeroboam, according to the above reckoning, occurred in the 15th. This latter synchronism is confirmed, and that with the 27th year of Jeroboam contradicted, by 2 Kings xiv, 17, which tells us that Amaziah king of Judah survived Joash king of Israel by 15 years. Most chronologers assume an interregnum of 11 years between Jeroboam's death and Zechariah's accession, during which the kingdom was suffering from the anarchy of a disputed succession, but this does not solve the difference between xiv, 17 and xv, 1. We are reduced to understand the number 27 in xv, 1 as referring to the years of Jeroboam's vicereignty on the occasion of his father's war with Syria (xiii, 14-25). See CHRONOLOGY. Josephus (Ant. ix, 10, 8) places Uzziah's accession in the 14th year of Jeroboam, a variation of a year in these synchronisms being unavoidable, since the Hebrew annalists in giving their dates do not reckon fractions of years. But in any case we must place Zechariah's accession early in B.C. 770. His reign lasted only six months. He was killed in a conspiracy of which Shallum (q. v.) was the head, and by which the prophecy in x, 30 was accomplished. We are told that during his brief term of power he did evil, and kept up the calf-worship inherited from the first Jeroboam, which his father had maintained in regal splendor at Bethel (Amos vii, 13). See ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.

In the English version of 2 Kings xv, 10 we read: "And Shallum the son of Jabesh conspired against him, and smote him before the people, and slew him, and reigned in his stead." And so the Vulg., "percussitque eum palam et interfecit." But in the Sept we find Κεθαλμ instead of before the people, i. e. Shallum and Keblaam killed Zechariah. The common editions read ἐν Κεθαλμ, meaning that Shallum killed Zechariah in Keblaam; but no place of such a name is known, and there is nothing in the Hebrew to answer to ἐν. The words translated before the people, Κεθαλμ, palam, are קָדְמָל. Ewald (Geschichte, iii, 598) maintains that קָדְמָל never occurs in prose [Is not the objection rather that the word is Chaldee? It occurs repeatedly in Daniel (ii, 31; iii, 8; v, 1, 5, 10), and also in the Chaldee portions of Ezra (iv, 16; vi, 13)], and that קָדְמָל would be קָדְמָל if the Latin and English translations were correct. He also observes that in 2 Kings xv, 14, 25, 30, where almost the same expression is used of the deaths of Shallum, Pekahiah, and Pekah, the words before the people are omitted. Hence he accepts the translation in the Vatican MS. of the Sept., and considers that Kabalam or Κεθαλμ was a fellow-conspirator or rival of Shallum, of whose subsequent fate we have no information. On the death of Zechariah, Shallum was made king, but, after reigning in Samaria for a month only, was in his turn dethroned and killed by Menahem. To these events Ewald refers the obscure passage in Zech. xi, 8: "Three shepherds also I cut off in one month, and my soul abhorred them"—the three shepherds being Zechariah, Kabalam, and Shallum. This is very ingenious: we must remember, however, that Ewald, like certain English divines (Mede, Hammond, Newcome, Secker, Pye Smith), thinks that the latter chapters of the prophecies of Zechariah belong to an earlier date than the rest of the book. See ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF.

18. A Kohathite Levite in the reign of Josiah, who was one of the overseers of the workmen engaged in the restoration of the Temple (2 Chron. xxxiv, 12). B.C. 628.

19. Second named of the three rulers of the Temple in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv, 8). B.C. 628. He was probably, as Bertheau conjectures, "the second priest" (comp. 2 Kings xxv, 18).

20. Son of Shiloni and father of Joiarib among the descendants of Perez (Neh. xi, 5). B.C. long ante 536.

21. A priest, son of Pashur and father of Amzi (Neh. xi, 12). B.C. long ante 536.

22. Son of Amariah and father of Uzziah, of the family of Perez (Neh. xi, 4). B.C. ante 536.

23. The representative of the priestly family of Iddo in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua (Neh. xii, 16). B.C. 536. He was possibly the same as Zechariah the prophet the son of Iddo.

24. The eleventh in order of the twelve minor prophets.

1. Of his personal history we know but little. He is called in his prophecy the son of Berechiah and the grandson of Iddo, whereas in the book of Ezra (v, 1; vi, 14) he is said to have been the son of Iddo. Various attempts have been made to reconcile this discrepancy. Cyril of Alexandria (Pref. Comment. ad Zech.) supposes that Berechiah was the father of Zechariah according to the flesh, and that Iddo was his instructor, and might be regarded as his spiritual father. Jerome, too, according to some MSS., has in Zech. i, 1, "filium Barachie, filium Addo," as if he supposed that Berechiah and Iddo were different names of the same person; and the same mistake occurs in the Sept.: τὸν τοῦ Βαπαχίου υἱὸν Ἀδδῶ. Gesenius (Lex. a. v. 72) and Rosenmüller (On Zech. i, 1) take 72 in the passages in Ezra to mean "grandson," as in Gen. xxix, 5 Laban is termed "the son," i. e. "grandson," of Nahor. Others, again, have suggested that in the text of Ezra no mention is made of Berechiah, because he was already dead, or because Iddo was the more distinguished person, and the generally recognised head of the family. Knobel thinks that the name of Berechiah has crept into the present text of Zechariah from Isa. viii, 2, where mention is made of a Zechariah "the son of Jeberechiah," which is virtually the same name (Sept. Bapaxiou) as Berechiah. His theory is that ch. ix-xi of our present book of Zechariah are really the work of the older Zechariah (Isa. viii, 2); that a later scribe finding the two books, one bearing the name of Zechariah the son of Iddo, and the other that of Zechariah the son of Berechiah, united them into one, and at the same time combined the titles of the two, and that hence arose the confusion which at present exists. This, however, is hardly a probable hypothesis. It is surely more natural to suppose, as the prophet himself mentions his father's name, whereas the historical books of Ezra and Nehemiah mention only Iddo, that Berechiah had died early, and that there was now no intervening link between the grandfather and the grandson. The son, in giving his pedigree, does not omit his father's name: the historian passes it over as of one who was but little known or already forgotten. This view is confirmed if we suppose the Iddo here mentioned to have been the Iddo the priest who, in Neh. xii, 4, is said to have returned from Babylon in company with Zerubbabel and Joshua. He is there said to have had a son Zechariah (ver. 16), who was contemporary with Joiakim the son of Joshua; and this falls in with the hypothesis that owing to some unexplained cause—perhaps the death of his father—Zechariah became the next representative of the family after his grandfather Iddo. Zechariah, according to this view, like Jeremiah and Ezekiel before him, was priest as well as prophet. He seems to have entered upon his office while yet young (<sup>72</sup>Zechar. ii, 4; comp. Jer. i, 6), and must have been born in Babylon, whence he returned with the first caravan of exiles under Zerubbabel and Joshua.

It was in the eighth month, in the second year of Darius, that he first publicly discharged his office. B.C. 519. In this he acted in concert with Haggai, who must have been considerably his senior if, as seems not improbable, Haggai had been carried into captivity, and hence had himself been one of those who had seen "the house" of Jehovah "in her first glory" (Hagg. ii, 3). Both prophets had the same great object before them; both directed all their energies to the building of the second Temple. Haggai seems to have led the way in this work, and then to have left it chiefly in the hands of his younger contemporary. The foundations of the new building had already been laid in the time of Cyrus, but during the reigns of Cambyses and the pseudo-Smerdis the work had been broken off through the jealousies of the Samaritans. When, however, Darius Hystaspis ascended the throne (521) things took a more favorable turn. He seems to have been a large-hearted and gracious prince, and to have been well-disposed towards the Jews. Encouraged by the hopes which his accession held out, the prophets exerted themselves to the utmost to secure the completion of the Temple. From this time, for a space of nearly two years, the prophet's voice was silent, or his words have not been recorded. But in the fourth year of king Darius, in the fourth day of the ninth month, there came a deputation of Jews to the Temple, anxious to know whether the fast-days which had been instituted during the seventy years' captivity were still to be observed. On the one hand, now that the captivity was at an end, and Jerusalem was rising from her ashes, such set times of mourning seemed quite out of place. On the other hand, there was still much ground for serious uneasiness; for some time after their return they had suffered severely from drought and famine (i, 6-11), and who could tell that they would not so suffer again? The hostility of their neighbors had not ceased; they were still regarded with no common jealousy; and large numbers of their brethren had not yet returned from Babylon. It was a question, therefore, that seemed to admit of much debate.

It is impossible not to see of how great moment, under such circumstances, and for the discharge of the special duty with which he was intrusted, would be the priestly origin of Zechariah. Too often the prophet had had to stand forth in direct antagonism to the priest. In an age when the service of God had stiffened into formalism, and the priests' lips no longer kept knowledge, the prophet was the witness for the truth which lay beneath the outward ceremonial, and without which the outward ceremonial was worthless. But the thing to be dreaded now was not superstitious formalism, but cold neglect. There was no fear now lest in a gorgeous temple, amid the splendors of an imposing ritual and the smoke of sacrifices ever ascending to heaven, the heart and life of religion should be lost. The fear was all the other way, lest even the body, the outward form and service, should be suffered to decay. The foundations of the Temple had indeed been laid, but that was all (Ezra v, 16). Discouraged by the opposition which they had encountered at first, the Jewish colony had begun to build, and were not able to finish; and even when the letter came from Darius sanctioning the work, and promising his protection, they showed no hearty disposition to engage in it. At such a time no more fitting instrument could be found to rouse the people, whose heart had grown cold, than one who united to the authority of the prophet the zeal and the traditions of a sacerdotal family. Accordingly, to Zechariah's influence we find the rebuilding of the Temple in a great measure ascribed. "And the elders of the Jews builded," it is said, "and they prospered through the prophesying of Haggai the prophet and Zechariah the son of Iddo" (vi, 14). It is remarkable that in this juxtaposition of the two names both are not styled prophets—not "Haggai and Zechariah the prophets," but "Haggai the prophet and Zechariah the son of Iddo." Is it an improbable conjecture that Zechariah is designated by his father's (or grandfather's) name, rather than by his office, in order to remind us of his priestly character? Be this as it may, we find other indications of the close union which now subsisted between the priests and the prophets. Various events connected with the taking of Jerusalem and the captivity in Babylon had led to the institution of solemn fast-days; and we find that when a question arose as to the propriety of observing these fast-days, now that the city and the Temple were rebuilt, the question was referred to "the priests which were in the house of Jehovah, and to the prophets"—a recognition not only of the joint authority, but of the harmony subsisting between the two bodies, without parallel in Jewish history. The manner, too, in which Joshua the high-priest is spoken of in this prophecy shows how lively a sympathy Zechariah felt towards him.

Later traditions assume, what is indeed very probable, that Zechariah took personally an active part in providing for the liturgical service of the Temple. He and Haggai are both said to have composed psalms with this view. According to the Sept., Psa. cxxxvii, cxlv-cxlviii; according to the Peshito, cxxv, cxxvi; according to the Vulg., cxi, are psalms of Haggai and Zechariah. The triumphant "hallelujah," with which many of them open, was supposed to be characteristic of those psalms which were first chanted in the second Temple, and came with an emphasis of meaning from the lips of those who had been restored to their native land. The allusions, moreover, with which these psalms abound, as well as their place in the Psalter, leave us in no doubt as to the time when they were composed, and lend confirmation to the tradition respecting their authorship. If the later Jewish accounts (the Talmudic tract Megillah, xvii, 2; xviii, 1; Rashi ad Baba Bathra, xv, 1) may be trusted, Zechariah, as well as Haggai, was a member of the great synagogue. The patristic notices of the prophet are worth nothing. According to these, he exercised his prophetic office in Chaldaea, and wrought many miracles there; returned to Jerusalem at an advanced age, where he discharged the duties of the priesthood, and where he died and was buried by the side of Haggai (Pseudepiph. De Proph. c. 21; Dorotheus, p. 144; Isidorus, c. 51).

2. The genuine writings of Zechariah help us but little in our estimation of his character. Some faint traces, however, we may observe in them of his education in Babylon. Less free and independent than he would have been had his feet trodden from childhood the soil

"Where each old poetic mountain Inspiration breathed around,"

he leans avowedly on the authority of the older prophets, and copies their expressions. Jeremiah especially seems to have been his favorite, and hence the Jewish saying that "the spirit of Jeremiah dwelt in Zechariah." But in what may be called the peculiarities of his prophecy he approaches more nearly to Ezekiel and Daniel. Like them, he delights in visions; like them, he uses symbols and allegories rather than the bold figures and metaphors which lend so much force and beauty to the writings of the earlier prophets; like them, he beholds angels ministering before Jehovah and fulfilling his behests on the earth. He is the only one of the prophets who speaks of Satan. That some of these peculiarities are owing to his Chaldaean education can hardly be doubted. It is at least remarkable that both Ezekiel and Daniel, who must have been influenced by the same associations, should in some of these respects so closely resemble Zechariah, widely as they differ from him in others.

Even in the form of the visions a careful criticism might perhaps discover some traces of the prophet's early training. Possibly the "valley of myrtles" in the first vision may have been suggested by Chaldaea rather than by Palestine. At any rate, it is a curious fact that myrtles are rarely mentioned in the history of the Jews before the Exile. They are found, besides this passage of Zechariah, in Isa. xli, 19; lv, 13, and in Neh. viii, 15. The forms of trial in the third vision, where Joshua the high-priest is arraigned, seem borrowed from the practice of Persian rather than Jewish courts of law. The filthy garments in which Joshua appears are those which the accused must assume when brought to trial. The white robe put upon him is the caftan or robe of honor, which to this day in the East is put upon the minister of state who has been acquitted of the charges laid against him. The vision of the woman in the Ephah is also Oriental in its character. Ewald refers to a very similar vision in Tod's Rajasthan, ii, 688. Finally, the chariots issuing from between two mountains of brass must have been suggested, there can scarcely be any doubt, by some Persian symbolism. See ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF.

25. The leader of the one hundred and fifty "sons" of Pharosh who returned with Ezra (Ezra viii, 3). B.C. 459.

26. The leader of the twenty-eight "sons" of Bebai, who came up from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii, 11). B.C. 459.

27. One of the chiefs of the people whom Ezra summoned in council at the river Ahava, before the second caravan returned from Babylon (Ezra viii, 16). B.C. 459. He stood at Ezra's left hand when he expounded the law to the people (Neh. viii, 4).

28. (Sept. Ζαχαρία.) One of the family of Elam, who had married a foreign wife after the Captivity (Ezra x, 26). B.C. 458.

29. One of the priests, son of Jonathan, who blew with the trumpets at the dedication of the city wall by Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. xii, 35, 41). B.C. 446.

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF. The time and personal circumstances of the prophet whose name this book bears have been considered above. It remains to discuss the prophecies themselves, and especially their authenticity. Their peculiar character and obscurity of interpretation also call for a somewhat full treatment.

1. Contents.—The book naturally falls into two principal divisions, which, as will be seen more fully in the sequel, are marked not only by certain peculiarities of expression, but obviously by the absence of any historical data in the latter portion such as are given in the former.

(1.) The first part, embracing ch. i-viii, divides itself into three sections by the chronological indications given respectively in i, 1, 7, and vii, 1; and these are still further subdivided by the recurrence of the phrase "the word of the Lord came unto me." This part, therefore, consists, first, of a short introduction or preface, in which the prophet announces his commission; then of a series of visions, descriptive of all those hopes and anticipations of which the building of the Temple was the pledge and sure foundation; and finally of a discourse, delivered two years later, in reply to questions respecting the observance of certain established fasts.

1. The short introductory oracle (i, 1-6) is a warning voice from the past. The prophet solemnly reminds the people, by an appeal to the experience of their fathers, that no word of God had ever fallen to the ground; and that therefore, if with sluggish indifference they refused to co-operate in the building of the Temple, they must expect the judgments of God. This warning manifestly rests upon the former warnings of Haggai.

2. In a dream of the night there passed before the eyes of the prophet a series of nine (essentially seven) visions, followed by an emblematical scene, descriptive in their different aspects of events, some of them shortly to come to pass, and others losing themselves in the mist of the future (i, 7-vi, 15). These visions are obscure, and accordingly the prophet asks their meaning. The interpretation is given, not as to Amos by Jehovah himself, but by an angel who knows the mind and will of Jehovah, who intercedes with him for others, and by whom Jehovah speaks and issues his commands; at one time he is called "the angel who spake with me" ["or by me"] (i, 9); at another, "the angel of Jehovah" (ver. 11, 12; iii, 1-6).

(1.) In the first vision (i, 8-17) the prophet sees, in a valley of myrtles, a rider upon a roan horse, accompanied by others who, having been sent forth to the four quarters of the earth, had returned with the tidings that the whole earth was at rest (with reference to Hagg. ii, 20). Hereupon the angel asks how long this state of things shall last, and is assured that the indifference of the heathen shall cease, and that the Temple shall be built in Jerusalem. This vision seems to have been partly borrowed from Job i, 7, etc.

(2.) The second vision (ii, 1-17, A. V. i, 18-ii, 13) explains how the promise of the first is to be fulfilled, and is composed of three separate emblems. The four horns are the symbols of the different heathen kingdoms in the four quarters of the world, which have hitherto combined against Jerusalem. The four carpenters or smiths symbolize their destruction. The measuring-line betokens the vastly extended area of Jerusalem, owing to the rapid increase of the new population. The old prophets, in foretelling the happiness and glory of the times which should succeed the Captivity in Babylon, had made a great part of that happiness and glory to consist in the gathering together again of the whole dispersed nation in the land given to their fathers. This vision was designed to teach that the expectation thus raised—the return of the dispersed of Israel—should be fulfilled; that Jerusalem should be too large to be compassed about by a wall, but that Jehovah himself would be to her a wall of fire—a light and defence to the holy city, and destruction to her adversaries. A song of joy, in prospect of so bright a future, closes the scene.

The next two visions (ch. iii, iv) are occupied with the Temple, and with the two principal persons on whom the hopes of the returned exiles rested.

(3.) The permission granted for the rebuilding of the Temple had, no doubt, stirred afresh the malice and the animosity of the enemies of the Jews. Joshua the high-priest had been singled out, it would seem, as the especial object of attack, and perhaps formal accusations had already been laid against him before the Persian court. The prophet, in vision, sees him summoned before a higher tribunal, and solemnly acquitted, despite the charges of the Satan or Adversary. This is done with the forms still usual in an Eastern court. The filthy garments in which the accused is expected to stand are taken away, and the caftan or robe of honor is put upon him in token that his innocence has been established. Acquitted at that bar, he need not fear, it is implied, any earthly accuser. He shall be protected, he shall carry on the building of the Temple, he shall so prepare the way for the coming of the Messiah, and upon the foundation-stone laid before him shall the seven eyes of God, the token of his ever-watchful providence, rest.

(4.) The succeeding vision (ch. iv) supposes that all opposition to the building of the Temple shall be removed. This sees the completion of the work. It has evidently a peculiarly impressive character; for the prophet, though his dream still continues, seems to himself to be awakened out of it by the angel who speaks to him. The candlestick (or, more properly, chandelier) with seven lights (borrowed from the candlestick of the Mosaic tabernacle, Exod. xxv, 31 sq.) supposes that the Temple is already finished. The seven pipes which supply each lamp answer to the seven eyes of Jehovah in the preceding vision (iii, 9), and this sevenfold supply of oil denotes the presence and operation of the Divine Spirit, through whose aid Zerubbabel will overcome all obstacles; so that as his hands had laid the foundation of the house, his hands should also finish it (iv, 9). The two olive-branches of the vision, belonging to the olive-tree standing by the candlestick, are Zerubbabel himself and Joshua.

The next two visions (v, 1-11) signify that the land, in which the sanctuary has just been erected, shall be purged of all its pollutions.

(5.) First, the curse is recorded against wickedness in the whole land (not in the whole earth, as in the A. V.), v, 3; that due solemnity may be given to it, it is inscribed upon a roll, and the roll is represented as flying, in order to denote the speed with which the curse will execute itself.

(6.) Next, the unclean thing, whether in the form of idolatry or any other abomination, shall be utterly removed. Caught and shut up as it were in a cage, like some savage beast, and pressed down with a weight as of lead upon it so that it cannot escape, it shall be carried into that land where all evil things have long made their dwelling (Isa. xxxiv, 13), the land of Babylon (Shinar, Zech. v, 11), from which Israel had been redeemed.

(7.) The night is now waning fast, and the morning is about to dawn (vi, 1-8). Chariots and horses appear, issuing from two brazen mountains, the horses like those in the first vision; and these receive their several commands and are sent forth to execute the will of Jehovah in the four quarters of the earth. The four chariots are images of the four winds, which, according to Psalms civ, 4, as servants of God, fulfil his behests; and of the one that goes to the north it is particularly said that it shall let the Spirit of Jehovah rest there: is it a spirit of anger against the nations, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, or is it a spirit of hope and desire of return in the hearts of those of the exiles who still lingered in the land of their captivity? Stähelin, Maurer, and others adopt the former view, which seems to be in accordance with the preceding vision; Ewald gives the latter interpretation, and thinks it is supported by what follows.

Thus the cycle of visions is completed. Scene after scene is unrolled till the whole glowing picture is presented to the eye. All enemies crushed; the land re-peopled, and Jerusalem girt as with a wall of fire; the Temple rebuilt, more truly splendid than of old, because more abundantly filled with a Divine Presence; the leaders of the people assured in the most signal manner of the Divine protection; all wickedness solemnly sentenced, and the land forever purged of it: such is the magnificent panorama of hope which the prophet displays to his countrymen. Very consolatory must such a prospect have seemed to the weak and disheartened colony in Jerusalem. For the times were dark and troublous. According to recent interpretations of newly discovered inscriptions, it would appear that Darius I found it no easy task to hold his vast dominions. Province after province had revolted both in the east and in the north, whither, according to the prophet (vi, 8), the winds had carried the wrath of God: and if the reading Mudraja, i. e. Egypt, is correct (Lassen gives Kurdistan), Egypt must have revolted before the outbreak mentioned in Herod. vii, 1, and have again been reduced to subjection. To such revolt there may possibly be an allusion in the reference to "the land of the south" (ver. 6). It would seem that Zechariah anticipated, as a consequence of these perpetual insurrections, the weakening and overthrow of the Persian monarchy and the setting-up of the kingdom of God, for which Judah, in faith and obedience, was to wait (ver. 9-15).

(8.) Immediately on these visions there follows a symbolical act (vi, 9-15). Three Israelites had just returned from Babylon, bringing with them rich gifts to Jerusalem, apparently as contributions to the Temple, and had been received in the house of Josiah the son of Zephaniah. Thither the prophet is commanded to go—whether still in a dream or not is not very clear—and to employ the silver and the gold of their offerings for the service of Jehovah. He is to make of them two crowns, and to place these on the head of Joshua the high-priest—a sign that in the Messiah who should build the Temple the kingly and priestly offices should be united. This, however, is expressed somewhat enigmatically, as if king and priest should be perfectly at one, rather than that the same person should be both king and priest. These crowns, moreover, were to be a memorial in honor of those by whose liberality they had been made, and should serve at the same time to excite other rich Jews still living in Babylon to the like liberality. Hence their symbolical purpose having been accomplished, they were to be laid up in the Temple.

3. It is remarkable, as has already been noticed, that the question relating to the fast days (vii, 1-3) should have been addressed to priests and prophets conjointly in the Temple. This close alliance between two classes hitherto so separate, and often so antagonistic, was one of the most hopeful circumstances of the times. Still Zechariah, as chief of the prophets, has the decision of this question. Some of the priests, it is evident (ver. 7), were inclined to the more gloomy view; but not so the prophet. In language worthy of his position and his office, language which reminds us of one of the most striking passages of his great predecessor (Isa. lviii, 5-7), he lays down the same principle that God loves mercy rather than fasting, and truth and righteousness rather than sackcloth and a sad countenance. If they had perished, he reminds them it was because their hearts were hard while they fasted; if they would dwell safely, they must abstain from fraud and violence, and not from food (Zech. vii, 4-14).

Again, he foretells, but not now in vision, the glorious times that are near at hand when Jehovah shall dwell in the midst of them, and Jerusalem be called a city of truth. He sees her streets thronged by old and young, her exiles returning, her Temple standing in all its beauty, her land rich in fruitfulness, her people a praise and a blessing in the earth (viii, 1-15). Again, he declares that "truth and peace" (ver. 16, 19) are the bulworks of national prosperity. And, once more reverting to the question which had been raised concerning the observance of the fasts, he announces, in obedience to the command of Jehovah, not only that the fasts are abolished, but that the days of mourning shall henceforth be days of joy, the fasts be counted for festivals. His prophecy concludes with a prediction that Jerusalem shall be the centre of religious worship to all nations of the earth (ver. 16-23).

(II.) The remainder of the book consists of two sections of about equal length, ch. ix-xi and xii-xiv, each of which has an inscription. They have the general prophetic tone and character, and in subject they so far harmonize with i-viii that the prophet seeks to comfort Judah in a season of depression with the hope of a brighter future.

1. In the first section he threatens Damascus and the sea-coast of Palestine with misfortune; but declares that Jerusalem shall be protected, for Jehovah himself shall encamp about her (where ix, 8 reminds us of ii, 5). Her king shall come to her; he shall speak peace to the heathen, so that all weapons of war shall perish; and his dominion shall be to the ends of the earth. The Jews who are still in captivity shall return to their land; they shall be mightier than Javan (or Greece); and Ephraim and Judah once more united shall vanquish all enemies. The land too shall be fruitful as of old (comp. viii, 12). The Teraphim and the false prophets may indeed have spoken lies; but upon these will the Lord execute judgment, and then he will look with favor upon his people and bring back both Judah and Ephraim from their captivity. The possession of Gilead and Lebanon is again promised as the special portion of Ephraim; and both Egypt and Assyria shall be broken and humbled.

The prophecy now takes a sudden turn. An enemy is seen approaching from the north, who, having forced the narrow passes of Lebanon, the great bulwark of the northern frontier, carries desolation into the country beyond. Hereupon the prophet receives a commission from God to feed his flock, which God himself will no more feed because of their divisions. The prophet undertakes the office, and makes to himself two staves (naming the one Favor and the other Union), in order to tend the flock, and cuts off several evil shepherds whom his soul abhors; but observes, at the same time, that the flock will not be obedient. Hence he throws up his office; he breaks asunder the one crook in token that the covenant of God with Israel was dissolved. A few, the poor of the flock, acknowledged God's hand herein; and the prophet, demanding the wages of his service, receives thirty pieces of silver, and casts it into the house of Jehovah. At the same time, he sees that there is no hope of union between Judah and Israel, whom he had trusted to feed as one flock, and therefore cuts in pieces the other crook, in token that the brotherhood between them is dissolved.

2. The second section (ch. xii-xiv) is entitled "The burden of the word of Jehovah for Israel." But Israel is here used of the nation at large, not of Israel as distinct from Judah. Indeed, the prophecy which follows concerns Judah and Jerusalem. In this the prophet beholds the near approach of troublous times, when Jerusalem should be hard pressed by enemies. But in that day Jehovah shall come to save them: "the house of David shall be as God, as the angel of Jehovah" (xii, 8), and all the nations which gather themselves against Jerusalem shall be destroyed. At the same time, the deliverance shall not be from outward enemies alone. God will pour out upon them a spirit of grace and supplications, so that they shall bewail their sinfulness with a mourning greater than that with which they bewailed the beloved Josiah in the valley of Megiddo. So deep and so true shall be this repentance, so lively the aversion to all evil, that neither idol nor false prophet shall again be seen in the land. If a man shall pretend to prophesy, "his father and his mother that begat him shall thrust him through when he prophesieth," fired by the same righteous indignation as Phinehas was when he slew those who wrought folly in Israel (xii, 1-xiii, 6).

Then follows a short apostrophe to the sword of the enemy to turn against the shepherds of the people; and a further announcement of searching and purifying judgments; which, however, it must be acknowledged, is somewhat abrupt. Ewald's suggestion that the passage xiii, 7-9 is here out of place, and should be transposed to the end of chap. xi, is certainly ingenious, and does not seem improbable.

The prophecy closes with a grand and stirring picture. All nations are gathered together against Jerusalem, and seem already sure of their prey. Half of their cruel work has been accomplished, when Jehovah himself appears on behalf of his people. At his coming all nature is moved; the Mount of Olives on which his feet rest cleaves asunder; a mighty earthquake heaves the ground, and even the natural succession of day and night is broken. He goes forth to war against the adversaries of his people. He establishes his kingdom over all the earth. Jerusalem is safely inhabited, and becomes rich with the spoils of the nations. All nations that are still left shall come up to Jerusalem, as the great centre of religious worship, there to worship "the King, Jehovah of hosts," and the city from that day forward shall be a holy city.

II. Integrity.—Mede was the first to call this in question. The probability that the later chapters (from the 9th to the 14th) were by some other prophet seems first to have been suggested to him by the citation in Matthew. He says (Epist. xxxi):

"It may seem the evangelist would inform us that those latter chapters ascribed to Zachary (namely, 9th, 10th, 11th, etc.) are indeed the prophecies of Jeremy, and that the Jews had not rightly attributed them. . . . Certainly, if a man weighs the contents of some of them, they should in likelihood be of an elder date than the time of Zachary—namely, before the Captivity—for the subjects of some of them were scarce in being after that time. And the chapter out of which St. Matthew quotes may seem to have somewhat much unsuitable with Zachary's time; as, a prophecy of the destruction of the Temple, then when he was to encourage them to build it. And how doth the sixth verse of that chapter suit with his time? There is no scripture saith they are Zachary's; but there is scripture saith they are Jeremy's, as this of the evangelist."

He then observes that the mere fact of these being found in the same book as the prophecies of Zechariah does not prove that they were his; difference of authorship being allowable in the same way as in the collection of Agur's Proverbs under one title with those of Solomon, and of Psalms by other authors with those of David. Even the absence of a fresh title is, he argues, no evidence against a change of author. "The Jews wrote in rolls or volumes, and the title was but once. If aught were added to the roll, ob similitudinem argumenti, or for some other reason, it had a new title, as that of Agur; or perhaps none, but was ἀνώνυμον." The utter disregard of anything like chronological order in the prophecies of Jeremiah, where "sometimes all is ended with Zedekiah; then we are brought back to Jehoiakim, then to Zedekiah again"—makes it probable, he thinks, that they were only hastily and loosely put together in those distracted times. Consequently, some of them might not have been discovered till after the return from the Captivity, when they were approved by Zechariah, and so came to be incorporated with his prophecies. Mede evidently rests his opinion, partly on the authority of Matthew, and partly on the contents of the later chapters, which he considers require a date earlier than the Exile. He says again (Epist. xi):

"That which moveth me more than the rest is in ch. xii, which contains a prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, and a description of the wickedness of the inhabitants, for which God would give them to the sword, and have no more pity on them. It is expounded of the destruction by Titus; but methinks such a prophecy was nothing seasonable for Zachary's time (when the city yet, for a great part, lay in her ruins, and the Temple had not yet recovered hers), nor agreeable to the scope of Zachary's commission, who, together with his colleague Haggai, was sent to encourage the people lately returned from captivity to build their temple, and to instaurate their commonwealth. Was this a fit time to foretell the destruction of both, while they were but yet a-building? and by Zachary, too, who was to encourage them? Would not this better befit the desolation by Nebuchadnezzar?"

Archbishop Newcome went further. He insisted on the great dissimilarity of style as well as subject between the earlier and later chapters. And he was the first who advocated the theory which Bunsen calls one of the triumphs of modern criticism, that the last six chapters of Zechariah are the work of two distinct prophets. His words are:

"The eight first chapters appear by the introductory parts to be the prophecies of Zechariah, stand in connection with each other, are pertinent to the time when they were delivered, are uniform in style and manner, and constitute a regular whole. But the six last chapters are not expressly assigned to Zechariah; are unconnected with those which precede; the three first of them are unsuitable in many parts to the time when Zechariah lived; all of them have a more adorned and poetical turn of composition than the eight first chapters; and they manifestly break the unity of the prophetic book. . . . I conclude from internal marks in ch. ix, x, xi, that these three chapters were written much earlier than the time of Jeremiah and before the captivity of the tribes. Israel is mentioned in Isa. i, xi, 14 (but that this argument is inconclusive, see Mal. ii, 11); Ephraim ix, 10, 18; x, 7; and Assyria x, 10, 11. . . . They seem to suit Hosea's age and manner. . . . The 12th, 13th, and 14th chapters form a distinct prophecy, and were written after the death of Josiah; but whether before or after the Captivity, and by what prophets, is uncertain, though I incline to think that the author lived before the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians."

In proof of this he refers to xiii, 2, on which he observes that the "prediction that idols and false prophets should cease at the final restoration of the Jews seems to have been uttered when idolatry and groundless pretensions to the spirit of prophecy were common among the Jews, and therefore before the Babylonish Captivity." A large number of critics have followed Mede and archbishop Newcome in denying the later date of the last six chapters of the book. In England, bishop Kidder, Whiston, Hammond, and more recently Pye Smith and Davidson; in Germany, Flügge, Eichhorn, Bauer, Bertholdt, Augusti, Forberg, Rosenmüller, Gramberg, Credner, Ewald, Maurer, Knobel, Hitzig, and Bleek, are agreed in maintaining that these later chapters are not the work of Zechariah the son of Iddo.

On the other hand, the later date of these chapters has been maintained among British writers, by Blayney and Henderson, and on the Continent by Carpozov, Beckhaus, Jahn, Köster, Hengstenberg, Hävernicks, Keil, De Wette (in later editions of his Einleitung; in the first three he adopted a different view), and Stähelin.

Those who impugn the later date of these chapters of Zechariah rest their arguments on the change in style and subject after the 8th chapter, but differ much in the application of their criticism. Rosenmüller, for instance (Schol. in Proph. Min. iv, 257), argues that ch. ix-xiv are so alike in style that they must have been written by one author. He alleges in proof his fondness for images taken from pastoral life (ix, 16; x, 2, 3; xi, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 11, 15, 17; xiii, 7, 8). From the allusion to the earthquake (xiv, 5; comp. Amos i, 1), he thinks the author must have lived in the reign of Uzziah. Davidson (in Horne's Introd. ii, 982) in like manner declares for one author, but supposes him to have been the Zechariah mentioned in Isa. viii, 2, who lived in the reign of Ahaz. Eichhorn, on the other hand, while also assigning (in his Einleitung, iv, 444) the whole of ch. ix-xiv to one writer, is of opinion that they are the work of a later prophet who flourished in the time of Alexander. Others again, as Bertholdt, Gesenius, Knobel, Maurer, Bunsen, and Ewald, think that ch. ix-xi (to which Ewald adds xiii, 7-9) are a distinct prophecy from ch. xii-xiv, and separated from them by a considerable interval of time. These critics conclude from internal evidence that the former portion was written by a prophet who lived in the reign of Ahaz (Knobel gives ix and x to the reign of Jotham, and xi to that of Ahaz), and most of them conjecture that he was the Zechariah the son of Jeberechiah (or Berechiah) mentioned in Isa. viii, 2. Ewald, without attempting to identify the prophet with any particular person, contents himself with remarking that he was a subject of the Southern kingdom (as may be inferred from expressions such as that in ix, 7, and from the Messianic hopes which he utters, and in which he resembles his countryman and contemporary Isaiah); and that, like Amos and Hosea before him, though a native of Judah, he directs his prophecies against Ephraim. There is the same general agreement among the last-named critics as to the date of the section xii-xiv. They all assign it to a period immediately previous to the Babylonian Captivity, and hence the author must have been contemporary with the prophet Jeremiah. Bunsen identifies him with Urijah, the son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim (Jer. xxvi, 20-23), who prophesied "in the name of Jehovah" against Judah and Jerusalem.

According to this hypothesis, we have the works of three different prophets collected into one book, and passing under one name: (a) Ch. ix-xi, the book of Zechariah I, a contemporary of Isaiah, under Ahaz, about 736; (b) ch. xii-xiv, author unknown (or perhaps Urijah, a contemporary of Jeremiah), about 607 or 606; (c) ch. i-viii, the work of the son (or grandson) of Iddo, Haggai's contemporary, about 520-518. We have, then, two distinct theories before us. The one merely affirms that the last six chapters of our present book are not from the same author as the first eight. The other carries the dismemberment of the book still further, and maintains that the last six chapters are the work of two distinct authors who lived at two distinct periods of Jewish history. The arguments advanced by the supporters of each theory rest on the same grounds. They are drawn partly from the difference in style, and partly from the difference in the nature of the contents, the historical references, etc., in the different sections of the book; but the one sees this difference only in ch. ix-xiv as compared with ch. i-viii; the other sees it also in ch. xii-xiv as compared with ch. ix-xi. We must accordingly consider (i) the difference generally in the style and contents of ch. ix-xiv as compared with ch. i-viii; (ii) the differences between ch. xii-xiv as compared with ch. ix-xi.

(A.) Arguments against the Integrity of the Book.—The difference in point of style between the latter and former portions of the prophecy is admitted by all critics. Rosenmüller characterizes that of the first eight chapters as "prosaic, feeble, poor," and that of the remaining six as "poetic, weighty, concise, glowing." But without admitting so sweeping a criticism, and one which the verdict of abler critics on the former portion has contradicted, there can be no doubt that the general tone and character of the one section are in decided contrast with those of the other. "As he passes from the first half of the prophet to the second," says Eichhorn, "no reader can fail to perceive how strikingly different are the impressions which are made upon him by the two. The manner of writing in the second portion is far loftier and more mysterious; the images employed are grander and more magnificent; the point of view and the horizon are changed. Once the Temple and the ordinances of religion formed the central point from which the prophet's words radiated, and to which they ever returned; now these have vanished. The favorite modes of expression, hitherto so often repeated, are now, as it were, forgotten. The chronological notices which before marked the day on which each several prophecy was uttered now fail us altogether. Could a writer all at once have forgotten so entirely his habits of thought? Could he so completely disguise his innermost feelings? Could the world about him, the mode of expression, the images employed, be so totally different in the case of one and the same writer?" (Einleit. iv, 443, § 606).

(I.) Ch. i-viii are marked by certain peculiarities of idiom and phraseology which do not occur afterwards. Favorite expressions are: "The word of Jehovah came unto," etc. (i, 7; iv, 8; vi, 9; vii, 1, 4, 8; viii, 1, 18): "Thus saith Jehovah (God) of hosts" (i, 4, 16, 17; ii, 11; viii, 2, 4, 6, 7, 9, 14, 18, 20, 23); "And I lifted up mine eyes and saw" (i, 18; ii, 1; v, 1; vi, 1): none of these modes of expression are to be met with in ch. ix-xiv. On the other hand, the phrase "In that day" is entirely confined to the later chapters, in which it occurs frequently. The form of the inscriptions is different. Introductions to the separate oracles, such as those in ix, 1; xii, 1, do not present themselves in the earlier portion. Zechariah, in several instances, states the time at which a particular prophecy was uttered by him (i, 1, 7; vii, 1). He mentions his own name in these passages, and also in vii, 8, and the names of contemporaries in iii, 1; iv, 6; vi, 10; vii, 2: the writer (or writers) of the second portion of the book never does this. It has also been observed that after the first eight chapters we hear nothing of "Satan," or of "the seven eyes of Jehovah;" that there are no more visions; that ch. xi contains no allegory, not a symbolic action; that here are no riddles which need to be solved, no angelus interpres to solve them.

(II.) Ch. ix-xi. These chapters, it is alleged, have also their characteristic peculiarities:

1. In point of style, the author resembles Hosea more than any other prophet; such is the verdict both of Knobel and Ewald. He delights to picture Jehovah as the great captain of his people. Jehovah comes to Zion, and pitches his camp there to protect her (ix, 8, 9). He blows the trumpet, marches against his enemies, makes his people his bow, and shoots his arrows (ver. 13, 14); or he rides on Judah as his war-horse, and goes forth thereon to victory (x, 3, 5). Again, he speaks of the people as a flock, and the leaders of the people as their shepherds (ix, 16; x, 2, 3; xi, 4 sq.). He describes himself also, in his character of prophet, as a shepherd in the last passages, and assumes to himself, in a symbolic action (which, however, may have been one only of the imagination), all the guise and the gear of a shepherd. In general he delights in images (ix, 3, 4, 13-17; x, 3, 5, 7, etc.), some of which are striking and forcible.

2. The notes of time are also peculiar:

(1.) It was a time when the pride of Assyria was yet at its height (ch. x, xi), and when the Jews had already suffered from it. This first took place in the time of Menahem (B.C. 772-761).

(2.) The Transjordanic territory had already been swept by the armies of the invader (x, 10), but a still further desolation threatened it (xi, 1-3). The first may have been the invasion of Pul (1 Chron. v, 26), the second that of Tiglath-pileser.

(3.) The kingdoms of Judah and Ephraim are both standing (ix, 10, 13; x, 6), but many Israelites are nevertheless exiles in Egypt and Assyria (ix, 11; x, 6, 8, 10, etc.).

(4.) The struggle between Judah and Israel is supposed to be already begun (xi, 14). At the same time, Damascus is threatened (ix, 1). If so, the reference must be to the alliance formed between Pekah king of Israel and Rezin of Damascus, the consequence of which was the loss of Elath (739).

(5.) Egypt and Assyria are both formidable powers (x, 9, 10, 11). The only other prophets to whom these two nations appear as formidable, at the same time, are Hosea (vii, 11; xii, 1; xiv, 3) and his contemporary Isaiah (vii, 17, etc.); and that in prophecies which must have been uttered between 743 and 740. The expectation seems to have been that the Assyrians, in order to attack Egypt, would march by way of Syria, Phœnicia, and Philistia, along the coast (Zech. ix, 1-9), as they did afterwards (Isa. xx, 1), and that the kingdom of Israel would suffer chiefly in consequence (Zech. ix, 9-12), and Judah in a smaller degree (ver. 8, 9).

(6.) The kingdom of Israel is described as "a flock for the slaughter" in ch. xi, over which three shepherds have been set in one month. This corresponds with the season of anarchy and confusion which followed immediately on the murder of Zechariah the son of Jeroboam II (760). This son reigned only six months, his murderer Shallum but one (2 Kings xv, 8-15), being put to death in his turn by Menahem. Meanwhile another rival king may have arisen, Bunsen thinks, in some other part of the country, who may have fallen as the murderer did, before Menahem.

(7.) The symbolical action of the breaking of the two shepherds' staves—Favor and Union—points the same way. The breaking of the first showed that God's favor had departed from Israel, that of the second that all hope of union between Judah and Ephraim was at an end.

All these notes of time, it is claimed, point in the same direction, and make it probable that the author of ch. ix-xi was a contemporary of Isaiah, and prophesied during the reign of Ahaz. According to Knobel, ch. ix and x were probably delivered in Jotham's reign, and ch. xi in that of Ahaz, who summoned Tiglath-pileser to his aid. Maurer thinks that ch. ix and x were written between the first (2 Kings xv, 29) and second (2 Kings xvii, 4-6) Assyrian invasions, ch. x during the seven years' interregnum which followed the death of Pekah, and xi in the reign of Hoshea.

(III.) Ch. xii-xiv. By the majority of those critics who assign these chapters to a third author, that author is supposed to have lived shortly before the Babylonian captivity. The grounds for separating these three chapters from ch. ix to xi are as follows:

1. This section opens with its own introductory formula, as the preceding one (ix, 1) does. This, however, only shows that the sections are distinct, not that they were written at different times.

2. The object of the two sections is altogether different. The author of the former (ch. ix-xi) has both Israel and Judah before him; he often speaks of them together (ix, 13; x, 6; xi, 14; comp. x, 7); he directs his prophecy to the Transjordanic territory, and announces the discharge of his office in Israel (xi, 4 sq.). The author of the second section, on the other hand, has only to do with Judah and Jerusalem: he nowhere mentions Israel.

3. The political horizon of the two prophets is different. By the former, mention is made of the Syrians, Phœnicians, Philistines (ix, 1-7), and Greeks (ver. 13), as well as of the Assyrians and Egyptians, the last two being described as at that time the most powerful. It therefore belongs to the earlier time when these two nations were beginning to struggle for supremacy in Western Asia. By the latter, the Egyptians only are mentioned as a hostile nation: not a word is said of the Assyrians. The author consequently must have lived at a time when Egypt was the chief enemy of Judah.

4. The anticipations of the two prophets are different. The first trembles only for Ephraim. He predicts the desolation of the Transjordanic territory, the carrying away captive of the Israelites, but also the return from Assyria and Egypt (x, 7, 10). But for Judah he has no cause of fear. Jehovah will protect her (ix, 8), and bring back those of her sons who in earlier times had gone into captivity (ver. 11). The second prophet, on the other hand, making no mention whatever of the northern kingdom, is full of alarm for Judah. He sees hostile nations gathering together against her, and two thirds of her inhabitants destroyed (xiii, 6); he sees the enemy laying siege to Jerusalem, taking and plundering it, and carrying half of her people captive (xii, 3; xiv, 2, 5). Of any return of the captives nothing is here said.

5. The style of the two prophets is different. The author of this last section is fond of the prophetic formula: וְהָיָה בְּיָמֵינוּ, "And it shall come to pass" (xii, 9; xiii, 2, 3, 4, 8; xiv, 6, 8, 18, 16); בְּיָמֵינוּ, "in that day"

(xii, 3, 4, 6, 8, 9, 11; xiii, 1, 2, 4; xiv, 8, 9, 13, 20, 21); נָאֻם יְהוָה, "saith Jehovah" (xii, 1, 4; xiii, 2, 7, 8). In the section ix-xi the first does not occur at all, the second but once (ix, 16), the third only twice (x, 12; xi, 6). We have, moreover, in this section certain favorite expressions: "all peoples," "all people of the earth," "all nations round about," "all nations that come up against Jerusalem," "the inhabitants of Jerusalem," "the house of David," "family" for nation, "the families of the earth," "the family of Egypt," etc.

6. There are apparently few notes of time in this section. One is the allusion to the death of Josiah in "the mourning of Hadad-rimmon in the valley of Megiddo;" another to the earthquake in the days of Uz-ziah king of Judah. This addition to the name of the king shows, Knobel suggests, that he had been long dead; but the argument, if it is worth anything, would make even more for those who hold a post-exile date. It is certainly remarkable, occurring thus in the body of the prophecy, and not in the inscription as in Isa. i, 1.

(B.) Arguments in Favor of the Integrity of the Book.

—(I.) As between ch. i-viii and ix-xiv.—1. In reply to all the foregoing arguments, it has been urged by Keil, Stähelin, and others that the difference of style between the two principal divisions of the prophecy is not greater than may reasonably be accounted for by the change of subject. The language in which visions are narrated would, from the nature of the case, be quieter and less animated than that in which prophetic anticipations of future glory are described. They differ as the style of the narrator differs from that of the orator. Thus, for instance, how different is the style of Hosea, ch. i-iii, from the style of the same prophet in ch. iv-xiv! or, again, that of Ezekiel vi, vii, from Ezekiel iv!

But, besides this, even in what may be termed the more oratorical portions of the first eight chapters, the prophet is to a great extent occupied with warnings and exhortations of a practical kind (see i, 4-6; vii, 4-14; viii, 9-28); whereas in the subsequent chapters he is rapt into a far-distant and glorious future. In the one case, therefore, the language would naturally sink down to the level of prose; in the other, it would rise to an elevation worthy of its exalted subject.

In like manner, the notes of time in the former part (i, 1, 7; vii, 1) and the constant reference to the Temple may be explained on the ground that the prophet here busies himself with the events of his own time, whereas afterwards his eye is fixed on a far-distant future.

On the other hand, where predictions do occur in the first section, there is a general similarity between them and the predictions of the second. The scene, so to speak, is the same; the same visions float before the eyes of the seer. The times of the Messiah are the theme of the predictions in ch. i-iv, in ix, x, and in xii-xiii, 6; while the events which are to prepare the way for that time, and especially the sifting of the nation, are dwelt upon in ch. v, in xi, and in xiii, 7-xiv, 2. The same peculiar forms of expression occur in the two divisions of the prophecy. Thus, for instance, we find וַיִּסְרֹף not only in vii, 14, but also in ix, 8; וַיִּסְרֹף, in the sense of "to remove," in iii, 4, and in xiii, 2—elsewhere it occurs in this unusual sense only in later writings (2 Kings xvi, 3; 2 Chron. xv, 8)—"the eye of God," as betokening the divine providence, in iii, 9; iv, 10; and in ix, 1, 8.

In both sections the return of the whole nation after the Exile is the prevailing image of happiness, and in both it is similarly portrayed. As in ii, 10, the exiles are summoned to return to their native land, because now, according to the principles of righteous recompense, they shall rule over their enemies, so also a similar strain occurs in ix, 12, etc. Both in ii, 10 and in ix, 9 the renewed protection wherewith God will favor Zion is represented as an entrance into his holy dwelling; in both his people are called on to rejoice, and in both there is a remarkable agreement in the words. In ii, 14, וְנִי וְשִׁמְחִי בְּחַיּוֹן כִּי הִנֵּנּוּ בָּא, and in ix, 9, נִי לִי מֵאֵד בְּחַיּוֹן הָרִיבִי בְּחַיּוֹן שְׁלֹמֹה הִנֵּנּוּ, בְּלִבְכֶּם יִבְרָא לָךְ.

Again, similar forms of expression occur in ii, 9, 11, and xi, 11; the description of the increase in Jerusalem, xiv, 10, may be compared with ii, 4; and the prediction in viii, 20-23 with that in xiv, 16. The resemblance which has been found in some other passages is too slight to strengthen the argument; and the occurrence of Chaldaisms, such as וְנִי וְשִׁמְחִי (ix, 8), וְנִי וְשִׁמְחִי (xiv, 10), בְּחַיּוֹן (which occurs besides only in Prov. xx, 21), and the phrase וְנִי וְשִׁמְחִי (ix, 13), instead of וְנִי וְשִׁמְחִי, really prove nothing as to the age of the later chapters of Zechariah. Indeed, generally, as regards these minute comparisons of different passages to prove an identity of authorship, Maurer's remark holds true: "Sed quæ potest vis esse dijectorum quorundam locorum, ubi res judicanda est ex toto?"

2. Of far more weight, however, than the arguments already advanced is the fact that the writer of these last chapters (ix-xiv) shows an acquaintance with the later prophets of the time of the Exile. That there are numerous allusions in it to earlier prophets, such as Joel, Amos, Micah, has been shown by Hitzig (Comment. p. 354, 2d ed.); but there are also, it is alleged, allusions to Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the latter part of Isaiah (ch. xl-lxvi). If this can be established, it is evidence that this portion of the book, if not written by Zechariah himself, was at least written after the Exile. We find, then, in Zech. ix, 2 an allusion to Ezek. xxviii, 3: in ver. 3 to 1 Kings x, 27; in ver. 5 to Zeph. ii, 4; in ver. 11 to Isa. li, 14; in ver. 12 to Isa. xlii, 9 and Isa. lxi, 7; in x, 3 to Ezek. xxxiv, 17. Zech. xi is derived from Ezek. xxxiv (comp. esp. ver. 4 with Ezek. xxxiv, 4), and Zech. xi, 3 from Jer. xii, 5. Zech. xii, 1 alludes to Isa. li, 13; xiii, 8, 9, to Ezek. v, 12; xiv, 8 to Ezek. xlvii, 1-12; ver. 10, 11, to Jer. xxxi, 88-40; ver. 16-19 to Isa. lxvi, 23 and lx, 12; ver. 20, 21, to Ezek. xliii, 12 and xlv, 9.

This manifest acquaintance on the part of the writer of Zech. ix-xiv with so many of the later prophets seemed so convincing to De Wette that, after having in the first three editions of his Introduction declared for two authors, he found himself compelled to change his mind, and to admit that the later chapters must belong to the age of Zechariah, and might have been written by Zechariah himself.

Bleek, on the other hand, has done his best to weaken the force of this argument, first by maintaining that in most instances the alleged agreement is only apparent, and, next, that where there is a real agreement (as in Zech. ix, 12; xi, 3; xii, 1; xiv, 16) with the passages above cited, Zechariah may be the original from whom Isaiah and Jeremiah borrowed. It must be confessed, however, that it is more probable that one writer should have allusions to many others than that many others should borrow from one; and this probability approaches certainty in proportion as we multiply the number of quotations or allusions. If there are passages in Zechariah which are manifestly similar to other passages in Zephaniah, in Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Deutero-Isaiah, which is the more probable, that they all borrowed from him, or he from them? In ix, 12 especially, as Stähelin argues, the expression is decidedly one to be looked for after the Exile rather than before it; and the passage rests upon Jer. xvi, 18, and has an almost verbal accordance with Isa. lxi, 7.

3. Again, the same critics argue that the historical references in the later chapters are perfectly consistent with a post-exile date. This had already been maintained by Eichhorn, although he supposes these chapters to have been written by a later prophet than Zechariah. Stähelin puts the case as follows: Even under the Persian rule the political relations of the Jews continued very nearly the same as they were in earlier times. They still were placed between a huge Eastern power on the one side, and Egypt on the other, the only difference now being that Egypt as well as Judæa was subject to the Persians. But Egypt was an unwilling vassal; and as in earlier times, when threatened by Assyria, she had sought for alliances among her neighbors or had endeavored to turn them to account as a kind of outwork in her own defence, so now she would adopt the same policy in her attempts to cast off the Persian yoke. It would follow, as a matter of course, that Persia would be on the watch to check such efforts, and would wreak her vengeance on those among her own tributary or dependent provinces which should venture to form an alliance with Egypt. Such of these provinces as lay on the sea-coast must indeed suffer in any case, even if they remained true in their allegiance to the Persians. The armies which were destined for the invasion of Egypt would collect in Syria and Phœnicia, and would march by way of the coast; and, whether they came as friends or as foes, they would probably cause sufficient devastation to justify the prophecy in Zech. ix, 1, etc., delivered against Damascus, Phœnicia, and Philistia. Meanwhile the prophet seeks to calm the minds of his own people by assuring them of God's protection, and of the coming of the Messiah, who, at the appointed time, shall again unite the two kingdoms of Judah and Ephraim. It is observable, moreover, that the prophet, throughout his discourses, is anxious not only to tranquilize the minds of his countrymen, but to prevent their engaging in any insurrection against their Persian masters, or forming any alliance with their enemies. In this respect he follows the example of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and, like these two prophets, he foretells the return of Ephraim, the union of Ephraim and Judah, and the final overthrow both of Assyria (x, 11)—that is, Persia—and of Egypt, the two countries which had, more than all others, vexed and devastated Israel. That a large portion of the nation was still supposed to be in exile is clear from ix, 11, 12, and hence ver. 10 can only be regarded as a reminiscence of Mic. v, 10; and even if x, 9 must be explained of the past (with De Wette, Einleit. § 250, 6, note a), still it appears from Josephus (Ant. xii, 2, 5) that the Persians carried away Jews into Egypt, and from Syncellus (p. 486, Niebuhr's ed.) that Ochus transplanted large numbers of Jews from Palestine to the east and north: the earlier custom of thus forcibly removing to a distance those conquered nations who, from disaffection or a turbulent spirit, were likely to give occasion for alarm, having not only continued among the Persians, but having become even more common than ever (Heeren, Ideen, i, 254, 2d ed.). This well-known policy on the part of their conquerors would be a sufficient ground for the assurance which the prophet gives in x, 9. Even the threats uttered against the false prophets and the shepherds of the people are not inconsistent with the times after the Exile. In Neh. v and vi, we find the nobles and rulers of the people oppressing their brethren, and false prophets active in their opposition to Nehemiah. In like manner "the idols" (עֲצָבִים) in xiii, 1-5 may be the same as the "Teraphim" of x, 2, where they are mentioned in connection with "the diviners" (חֲזִקִּים). Malachi (iii, 5) speaks of "sorcerers" (מְכַשְׁפִּים), and that such superstition long held its ground among the Jews is evident from Josephus (Ant. viii, 2, 5). Nor does xiv, 21 of necessity imply either idol-worship or heathen pollution in the Temple. Ch. xi was spoken by the prophet later than ch. ix and x. In ver. 14 he declares the impossibility of any reunion between Judah and Ephraim, either because the northern territory had already been laid waste, or because the inhabitants of it had shown a disposition to league with Phœnicia in a vain effort to throw off the Persian yoke, which would only involve them in certain destruction. This difficult passage Stähelin admits he cannot solve to his satisfaction, but contends that it may have been designed to teach the new colony that it was not a part of God's purpose to reunite the severed tribes; and in this he sees an argument for the post-exilic date of the prophecy, inasmuch as the union of the ten tribes with the two was ever one of the brightest hopes of the prophets who lived before the Captivity.

Having thus shown that there is no reason why the section ix-xi should not belong to a time subsequent to the return from Babylon, Stähelin proceeds to argue that the prophecy directed against the nations (ix, 1-7) is really more applicable to the Persian æra than to any other. It is only the coast-line which is here threatened; whereas the earlier prophets, whenever they threaten the maritime tribes, unite with them Moab and Ammon, or Edom. Moreover, the nations here mentioned are not spoken of as enemies of Judah; for being Persian subjects they would not venture to attack the Jewish colony when under the special protection of that power. Of Ashdod it is said that a foreigner (אַרְמִי, A. V. "bastard") shall dwell in it. This, too, might naturally have happened in the time of Zechariah. During the Exile, Arabs had established themselves in Southern Palestine, and the prophet foresees that they would occupy Ashdod; and, accordingly, we learn from Neh. xiii, 24 that the dialect of Ashdod was unintelligible to the Jews, and in iv, 7 the people of Ashdod appear as a distinct tribe united with other Arabians against Judah. The king of Gaza (mentioned in Zech. ix, 5) may have been a Persian vassal, as the kings of Tyre and Sidon were, according to Herod. viii, 67. A king in Gaza would only be in conformity with the Persian custom (see Herod. iii, 15), although this was no longer the case in the time of Alexander. The mention of the "sons of Javan" (ix, 13; A. V. "Greece") is suitable to the Persian period (which is also the view of Eichhorn), as it was then that the Jews were first brought into any close contact with the Greeks. It was, in fact, the fierce struggle between Greece and Persia which gave a peculiar meaning to his words when the prophet promised his own people victory over the Greeks, and so reversed the earlier prediction of Joel iv, 6, 7 (A. V. iii, 6, 7). If, however, we are to understand by Javan Arabia, as some maintain, this again equally suits the period supposed, and the prophecy will refer to the Arabians, of whom we have already spoken.

(II.) We come now to the section xii-xiv. The main proposition here is, that however hard Judah and Jerusalem may be pressed by enemies (of Israel there is no further mention), still with God's help they shall be victorious; and the result shall be that Jehovah will be more truly worshipped both by Jews and Gentiles. That this anticipation of the gathering of hostile armies against Jerusalem was not unnatural in the Persian times may be inferred from what has been said above. Persian hosts were often seen in Judæa. We find an instance of this in Josephus (Ant. xi, 7, 1), and Sidon was laid in ashes in consequence of an insurrection against Persia (Diod. xvi, 45). On the other hand, how could a prophet in the time immediately preceding the Exile—the time to which, on account of xii, 12, most critics refer this section—have uttered predictions such as these? Since the time of Zephaniah all the prophets looked upon the fate of Jerusalem as sealed, whereas here, in direct contradiction to such views, the preservation of the city is announced even in the extremest calamities. Any analogy to the general strain of thought in this section is only to be found in Isa. xxix-xxxiii. Besides, no king is here mentioned, but only "the house of David," which, according to Jewish tradition (Herzfeld, Gesch. des Volkes Israel, p. 378 sq.), held a high position after the Exile, and accordingly is mentioned (xii, 12, 13) in its different branches (comp. Movers, Das Phöniz. Alterth. i, 581), together with the tribe of Levi; the prophet, like the writer of Psa. lxxxix, looking to it with a kind of yearning, which before the Exile, while there was still a king, would have been inconceivable. Again, the manner in which Egypt is alluded to (xiv, 19) almost of necessity leads us to the Persian times; for then Egypt, in consequence of her perpetual efforts to throw off the Persian yoke, was naturally brought into hostility with the Jews, who were under the protection of Persia. Before the Exile this was only the case during the interval between the death of Josiah and the battle of Carchemish. It would seem, then, that there is nothing to compel us to place this section xii-xiv in the times before the Exile; much, on the contrary, which can only be satisfactorily accounted for on the supposition that it was written during the period of the Persian dominion. Nor must it be forgotten that we have here that fuller development of the Messianic idea which at such a time might be expected, and one which, in fact, rests upon all the prophets who flourished before the Exile.

Such are the grounds, critical and historical, on which Stähelin rests his defence of the later date of the second portion of the prophet Zechariah. We have given his arguments at length as the ablest and most complete, as well as the most recent, on his side of the controversy. Some of them, it must be admitted, are full of weight. When critics like Eichhorn maintain that of the whole section ix, 1-x, 17, no explanation is possible, unless we derive it from the history of Alexander the Great; and when De Wette, after having adopted the theory of different authors, felt himself obliged to abandon it for reasons already mentioned, and to vindicate the integrity of the book, the grounds for a post-exile date must be very strong. Indeed, it is not easy to say which way the weight of evidence preponderates.

(C.) With regard to the quotation in Matthew (xxvii, 9, 10; comp. Zech. xi, 12, 13) there seems no good reason for setting aside the received reading. Jerome observes (Comment. in Evang. Matth. xxvii, 9, 10),

"This passage is not found in Jeremiah. But in Zechariah, who is nearly the last of the twelve prophets, something like it occurs; and though there is no great difference in the meaning, yet both the order and the words are different. I read a short time since, in a Hebrew volume, which a Hebrew of the sect of the Nazarenes presented to me, an apocryphal book of Jeremiah, in which I found the passage word for word. But still I am rather inclined to think that the quotation is made from Zechariah, in the usual manner of the evangelists and apostles, who, neglecting the order of the words, only give the general sense of what they cite from the Old Test."

Eusebius (Evang. Demonstr. lib. x) is of opinion that the passage thus quoted stood originally in the prophecy of Jeremiah, but was either erased subsequently by the malice of the Jews [a very improbable supposition, it need hardly be said], or that the name of Zechariah was substituted for that of Jeremiah through the carelessness of copyists. Augustine (De Cons. Evangel. iii, 30) testifies that the most ancient Greek copies had Jeremiah, and thinks that the mistake was originally Matthew's, but that this was divinely ordered, and that the evangelist would not correct the error even when pointed out, in order that we might thus infer that all the prophets spake by one Spirit, and that what was the work of one was the work of all ("et singula esse omnium, et omnia singulorum"). Some later writers account for the non-appearance of the passage in Jeremiah by the confusion in the Greek MSS. of his prophecies—a confusion, however, it may be remarked, which is not confined to the Greek, but which is found no less in our present Hebrew text. Others, again, suggest that in the Greek autograph of Matthew, ΖΠΙΟΥ may have been written, and that copyists may have taken this for ΙΠΙΟΥ. But there is no evidence that abbreviations of this kind were in use so early. Epiphanius and some of the Greek fathers seem to have read ἐν τοῖς προφήταις. The most ancient copy of the Latin version of the Gospels omits the name of Jeremiah, and has merely dictum est per Prophetam. It has been conjectured that this represents the original Greek reading τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ τοῦ Προφήτου, and that some early annotator wrote 'Ἐπεμύον on the margin, whence it crept into the text. The choice lies between this, and a slip of memory on the part of the evangelist, if we admit the integrity of our present book of Zechariah, unless, indeed, we suppose, with Eichhorn, who follows Jerome, that an Apocryphal book of Jeremiah is quoted. Theophylact proposes to insert a καί, and would read διὰ 'Ἐπεμύον καὶ τοῦ Προφήτου—ἦγον Ζαχαρίου. He argues that the quotation is really a fusion of two passages; that concerning the price paid occurring in Zech. xi, and that concerning the field in Jer. xix. But what New-Test. writer would have used such a form of expression "by Jeremy and the Prophet?" Such a mode of quotation is without parallel. At the same time, it must be borne in mind that the passage as given in Matthew does not represent exactly either the Hebrew text of Zechariah or the version of the Sept. The other passages of the prophet quoted in the New Test. are ix, 9 (in Matt. xxi, 5; John xii, 15); xii, 10 (in John xix, 37; Rev. 1, 7); xiii, 7 (in Matt. xxvi, 31; Mark xiv, 27); but in no instance is the prophet quoted by name.

(D.) The following writers have discussed the question of the integrity of Zechariah: Mede, Works (Lond. 1664), p. 786, 884; Kidder [Bp.], Demonstration of the Messias (ibid. 1700), ii, 199; Newcome [Archbp.], Minor Prophets (ibid. 1785); Blayney, New Translation of Zechariah (Oxf. 1797); Carpov, *Vindic. III. Style and Diction.—Some of Zechariah's peculiarities in these respects have been noticed above. It will have been already perceived that the symbols with which he abounds are obscure, and their prosaic structure is diffuse and unvaried. The rhythm of his poetry is unequal, and its parallelisms are inharmonious and disjointed. His language has in many phrases a close alliance with that of the other prophets, and occasional imitations of them, especially of Ezekiel, characterize his oracles. He is also peculiar in his introduction of spiritual beings into his prophetic scenes.

In point of phraseology, generally speaking, Zechariah's style is pure and remarkably free from Chaldaisms. As is common with writers in the decline of a language, he seems to have striven to imitate the purity of the earlier models; but in orthography, and in the use of some words and phrases, he betrays the influence of a later age. He writes מַלְאָכִים and מַלְאָכִים, and employs זֶדֶד (v, 7) in its later use as the indefinite article, and אֶזְדֶּדֶת with the fem. termination (iv, 12). A full collection of these peculiarities will be found in Köster, Meletemata in Zech. etc.

Zēdad (Heb. Tsedad, זֶדֶד [with ז directive, Tsedu 'dah, זֶדֶד, slope; Sept. Zadaḏā v. r. Sapaḏā, etc.), one of the landmarks on the northern border of the land of Israel, as promised by Moses (Numb. xxxiv, 8) and as restored by Ezekiel (xlvi, 15). In the former passage it occurs between "the entrance of Hamath" and Ziphron, and in the latter between the "road to Hethlon" and Hamath. A place named Sūdūd exists to the east of the northern extremity of the chain of Antilibanus, about fifty miles E.N.E. of Baalbek and thirty-five S.E.E. of Hums (Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii, 507; Wetzstein, Reis. ü. Hauran, p. 88), which Porter thinks is identical with Zedad (Five Years in Damascus, ii, 354-356; Giant Cities of Bashan, p. 317); and so also apparently rabbi Schwarz (Palest. p. 26); but the boundaries of Palestine proper never extended so far northward. See TRIBE. A trace of the name possibly lingers in the desert plain called Sahil Judeideh, on the western slope of Antilibanus, in or near the district of Zebedāny (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 490).

Zedechi'as (Σεδεκίας), the Greek form (1 Esdr. i. 46) of the name of king ZEDEKIAH (q. v.).

Zedeki'ah (Heb. Tsidkiyah, זֶדֶקְיָה [but in this simple form only in 1 Kings xxii, 11; Neh. x, 1; Jer. xxvii, 12; xxviii, 1; xxix, 8; elsewhere in the prolonged form Tsidkiya 'hu, זֶדֶקְיָהוּ], my righteousness is Jah, or, righteousness of Jehovah; Sept. and Josephus, Σεδεκίας), the name of several Hebrews.

1. Son of Chenaanah, a prophet at the court of Ahab, head, or, if not head, virtual leader, of the college. He appears but once, viz., as spokesman when the prophets are consulted by Ahab on the result of his proposed expedition to Ramoth-Gilead (1 Kings xxii; 2 Chron. xviii). B.C. 896. Zedekiah had prepared himself for the interview with a pair of iron horns, after the symbolic custom of the prophets (comp. Jer. xiii, xix), the horns of the re'em, or buffalo, which was the recognised emblem of the tribe of Ephraim (Deut. xxxiii, 17). With these, in the interval of Micaiah's arrival, he illustrated the manner in which Ahab should drive the Syrians before him. When Micaiah appeared and had delivered his prophecy, Zedekiah sprang forward and struck him a blow on the face, accompanying it by a taunting sneer. For this he is threatened by Micaiah in terms which are hardly intelligible to us, but which evidently allude to some personal danger to Zedekiah.

The narrative of the Bible does not imply that the blow struck by Zedekiah was prompted by more than sudden anger, or a wish to insult and humiliate the prophet of Jehovah. But Josephus takes a very different view, which he develops at some length (Ant. viii, 15, 8). He relates that after Micaiah had spoken, Zedekiah again came forward, and denounced him as false, on the ground that his prophecy contradicted the prediction of Elijah, that Ahab's blood should be licked up by dogs in the field of Naboth of Jezreel; and, as a further proof that he was an impostor, he struck him, daring him to do what Iddo, in somewhat similar circumstances, had done to Jeroboam—viz. wither his hand. This addition is remarkable; but it is related by Josephus with great circumstantiality, and was perhaps drawn by him from that source, now lost, from which he has added so many touches to the outlines of the sacred narrative.

As to the question of what Zedekiah and his followers were, whether prophets of Jehovah or of some false deity, it seems hardly possible to entertain any doubt. True, they use the name of Jehovah, but that was a habit of false prophets (Jer. xxviii, 2; comp. xxix, 21, 31); and there is a vast difference between the casual manner in which they mention the awful name and the full and, as it were, formal style in which Micaiah proclaims and reiterates it. Seeing, also, that Ahab and his queen were professedly worshippers of Baal and Ashtaroth, and that a few years only before this event they had an establishment consisting of two bodies—one of 450, the other of 400—prophets of this false worship, it is difficult to suppose that there could have been also 400 prophets of Jehovah at his court. But the inquiry of the king of Judah seems to decide the point. After hearing the prediction of Zedekiah and his fellows, he asks at once for a prophet of Jehovah: "Is there not here besides (זֶדֶד) a prophet of Jehovah that we may inquire of him?" The natural inference seems to be that the others were not prophets of Jehovah, but were the 400 prophets of Ashtaroth (A. V. "the groves") who escaped the sword of Elijah (comp. 1 Kings xviii, 19 with 22, 40). They had spoken in his name, but there was something about them—some trait of manner, costume, or gesture—which aroused the suspicions of Jehoshaphat, and, to the practiced eye of one who lived at the centre of Jehovah-worship and was well versed in the marks of the genuine prophet, proclaimed them counterfeits. See MICAIAH.

2. The son of Hananiah, one of the princes of Judah who were assembled in the scribes' chamber of the king's palace when Micaiah announced that Baruch had read the words of Jeremiah in the ears of the people from the chamber of Gemariah the scribe (Jer. xxxvi, 12). B.C. 605.

3. The last king of Judah and Jerusalem. B.C. 598-588. He was the son of Josiah, and his genealogy is given in 1 Chron. iii, 15, from which it appears that the sons of Josiah were Johanan the first-born (who is never elsewhere mentioned, and therefore probably had died young, or had been set aside by some popular resolution, to which Shallum may have been indebted for the crown in preference to his elder brother, Jehoia-kim), the second Jehoia-kim, the third Zedekiah, and the fourth Shallum. Since Jehoia-kim was twenty-five at his father's death, and Jehoahaz, or Shallum, twenty-three, while Zedekiah was not twenty-one till his accession to the throne, eleven years later, there must be a different order from that of age adopted with the last two sons of Josiah: perhaps it was arranged so as to bring together the two sons of Josiah, who reigned each eleven years, each having been preceded by a king who reigned for only three months. Zedekiah is, indeed, called the brother of his predecessor Jehoia-kim (2 Chron. xxxvi, 10); but the word must be used in an indefinite sense, for he certainly was his uncle. His mother was Hamutal, the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah; so that he was full brother of Jehoahaz (2 Kings xxiii, 31; xxiv, 18).

His original name had been Mattaniah, which was changed to Zedekiah by Nebuchadnezzar when he carried off his nephew Jehoia-kim to Babylon, and left him on the throne of Jerusalem. Zedekiah was but twenty-one years old when he was thus placed in charge of an impoverished kingdom, and a city which, though still strong in its natural and artificial impregnability, was bereft of well-nigh all its defenders. But Jerusalem might have remained the head of the Babylonian province of Judah, and the Temple of Jehovah continued standing, had Zedekiah possessed wisdom and firmness enough to remain true to his allegiance to Babylon. This, however, he could not do (Jer. xxxviii, 5). His history is contained in the short sketch of the events of his reign given in 2 Kings xxiv, 17-xxv, 7, and, with some trifling variations, in Jer. xxxix, 1-7; lli, 1-11, together with the still shorter summary in 2 Chron. xxxvi, 10, etc.; and also in Jer. xxi, xxiv, xxvii, xxviii, xxix, xxxii, xxxiii, xxxiv, xxxvii, xxxviii (being the chapters containing the prophecies delivered by this prophet during this reign, and his relation of various events more or less affecting Zedekiah), and Ezek. xvi, 11-21. To these it is important to add the narrative of Josephus (Ant. x, 7, 1-8, 2), which is partly constructed by comparison of the documents enumerated above, but also seems to contain information derived from other and independent sources. From these it is evident that Zedekiah was a man not so much bad at heart as weak in will. He was one of those unfortunate characters, frequent in history, like Charles I of England and Louis XVI of France, who find themselves at the head of affairs during a great crisis, without having the strength of character to enable them to do what they know to be right, and whose infirmity becomes moral guilt. The princes of his court, as he himself pathetically admits in his interview with Jeremiah, described in ch. xxxviii, had him completely under their influence. "Against them," he complains, "it is not the king that can do anything." He was thus driven to disregard the counsels of the prophet, which, as the event proved, were perfectly sound; and he who might have kept the fragments of the kingdom of Judah together, and maintained for some generations longer the worship of Jehovah, brought final ruin on his country, destruction on the Temple, death to his family, and a cruel torment and miserable captivity on himself.

It is evident from Jer. xxvii (in ver. 1 Jehoia-kim's name is a copyist's error for that of Zedekiah) and

xxviii (apparently the earliest prophecies delivered during this reign) that the earlier portion of Zedekiah's reign was marked by an agitation throughout the whole of Syria against the Babylonian yoke. Jerusalem seems to have taken the lead, since in the fourth year of Zedekiah's reign we find ambassadors from all the neighboring kingdoms—Tyre, Sidon, Edom, and Moab—at his court, to consult as to the steps to be taken. This happened either during the king's absence or immediately after his return from Babylon, whither he had gone on some errand, the nature of which is not named, but which may have been an attempt to blind the eyes of Nebuchadnezzar to his contemplated revolt (Jer. li, 59). The project was attacked by Jeremiah with the strongest statement of the folly of such a course—a statement corroborated by the very material fact that a man of Jerusalem named Hananiah, who had opposed him with a declaration in the name of Jehovah, that the spoils of the Temple should be restored within two years, had died, in accordance with Jeremiah's prediction, within two months of its delivery. This, and perhaps also the impossibility of any real alliance between Judah and the surrounding nations, seems to have put a stop, for the time, to the anti-Babylonian movement. On a man of Zedekiah's temperament the sudden death of Hananiah must have produced a strong impression; and we may without improbability accept this as the time at which he procured to be made in silver a set of the vessels of the Temple to replace the golden plate carried off with his predecessor by Nebuchadnezzar (Bar. i, 8).

The first act of overt rebellion of which any record survives was the formation of an alliance with Egypt, of itself equivalent to a declaration of enmity with Babylon. In fact, according to the statement of Chronicles and Ezekiel, with the expansion of Josephus, it was in direct contravention of the oath of allegiance in the name of Elohim by which Zedekiah was bound by Nebuchadnezzar—namely, that he would keep the kingdom for Nebuchadnezzar, make no innovation, and enter into no league with Egypt (Ezek. xvii, 13; 2 Chron. xxxvi, 13; Joseph. Ant. x, 7, 1). As a natural consequence, it brought on Jerusalem an immediate invasion of the Chaldeans. The mention of this event in the Bible, though sure, is extremely slight, and occurs only in Jer. xxxiv, 21; xxxvii, 5-11, and Ezek. xvii, 15-20; but Josephus (x, 7, 3) relates it more fully, and gives (probably by conjecture) the date of its occurrence as the eighth year of Zedekiah. Probably, also, the denunciations of an Egyptian alliance contained in Jer. ii, 18, 36, have reference to the same time. It appears that Nebuchadnezzar, being made aware of Zedekiah's defection, either by the non-payment of the tribute or by other means, at once sent an army to ravage Judæa. This was done, and the whole country was reduced, except Jerusalem and two strong places in the western plain, Lachish and Azekah, which still held out (Jer. xxxiv, 7). In the panic which followed the appearance of the Chaldeans, Zedekiah succeeded in inducing the princes and other inhabitants of Jerusalem to abolish the odious custom which prevailed of enslaving their countrymen. A solemn rite (ver. 18), recalling in its form that in which the original covenant of the nation had been made with Abram (Gen. xv, 9, etc.), was performed in the Temple (Jer. xxxiv, 15), and a crowd of Israelites of both sexes found themselves released from slavery.

In the meantime Pharaoh had moved to the assistance of his ally. On hearing of his approach, the Chaldeans at once raised the siege and advanced to meet him. The nobles seized the moment of respite to reassert their power over the king, and their defiance of Jehovah, by re-enslaving those whom they had so recently manumitted; and the prophet thereupon utters a doom on these miscreants which, in the fierceness of its tone and in some of its expressions, recalls those of Elijah on Ahab (Jer. xxxiv, 20). This encounter was quickly followed by Jeremiah's capture and imprisonment, which, but for the interference of the king (Jer. xxxvii, 17, 21), would have rapidly put an end to his life (ver. 20). How long the Babylonians were absent from Jerusalem we are not told. It must have required at least several months to move a large army and baggage through the difficult and tortuous country which separates Jerusalem from the Philistine Plain, and to effect the complete repulse of the Egyptian army from Syria, which Josephus affirms was effected. All we certainly know is that on the tenth day of the tenth month of Zedekiah's ninth year, the Chaldeans were again before the walls (lii, 4). From this time forward the siege progressed slowly but surely to its consummation, with the accompaniment of both famine and pestilence (Josephus). Zedekiah again interfered to preserve the life of Jeremiah from the vengeance of the princes (xxxviii, 7-13), and then occurred the interview between the king and the prophet of which mention has already been made, and which affords so good a clew to the condition of abject dependence into which a long course of opposition had brought the weak-minded monarch. It would seem from this conversation that a considerable desertion had already taken place to the besiegers, proving that the prophet's view of the condition of things was shared by many of his countrymen. But the unhappy Zedekiah throws away the chance of preservation for himself and the city which the prophet set before him, in his fear that he would be mocked by those very Jews who had already taken the step Jeremiah was urging him to take (ver. 19). At the same time, his fear of the princes who remained in the city is not diminished, and he even condescends to impose on the prophet a subterfuge, with the view of concealing the real purport of his conversation from these tyrants of his spirit (ver. 24-27).

But while the king was hesitating the end was rapidly coming nearer. The city was indeed reduced to the last extremity. The fire of the besiegers had throughout been very destructive (Josephus), but it was now aided by a severe famine. The bread had long been consumed (Jer. xxxviii, 9), and all the terrible expedients had been tried to which the wretched inhabitants of a besieged town are forced to resort in such cases. Mothers had boiled and eaten the flesh of their own infants (Bar. ii, 3; Lam. iv, 10). Persons of the greatest wealth and station were to be seen searching the dunghills for a morsel of food. The effeminate nobles, whose fair complexions had been their pride, wandered in the open streets like blackened but living skeletons (ver. 5, 8). Still the king was seen in public, sitting in the gate where justice was administered, that his people might approach him, though indeed he had no help to give them (Jer. xxxviii, 7).

At last, after sixteen dreadful months had dragged on, the catastrophe arrived. It was on the ninth day of the fourth month, about the middle of July, at midnight, as Josephus with minuteness informs us, that the breach in those stout and venerable walls was effected. The moon, nine days old, had gone down below the hills which form the western edge of the basin of Jerusalem, or was, at any rate, too low to illuminate the utter darkness which reigns in the narrow lanes of an eastern town, where the inhabitants retire early to rest, and where there are but few windows to emit light from within the houses. The wretched remnants of the army, starved and exhausted, had left the walls, and there was nothing to oppose the entrance of the Chaldeans. Passing in through the breach, they made their way, as their custom was, to the centre of the city, and for the first time the Temple was entered by a hostile force, and all the princes of the court of the great king took their seats in state in the middle gate of the hitherto virgin house of Jehovah. The alarm quickly spread through the sleeping city, and Zedekiah, collecting his wives and children (Josephus), and surrounding himself with the few soldiers who had survived the accidents of the siege, made his way out of the city at the opposite end to that at which the Assyrians had entered, by a street which, like the Beine-Surein at Damascus, ran between two walls (probably those on the east and west sides of the so-called Tyropœon valley), and issued at a gate above the royal gardens and the Fountain of Siloam. Thence he took the road towards the Jordan, perhaps hoping to find refuge, as David had, at some fortified place in the mountains on its eastern side. On the road they were met and recognised by some of the Jews who had formerly deserted to the Chaldeans. By them the intelligence was communicated, with the eager treachery of deserters, to the generals in the city (Josephus), and, as soon as the dawn of day permitted it, swift pursuit was made. The king's party must have had some hours' start, and ought to have had no difficulty in reaching the Jordan; but, either from their being on foot, weak and infirm, while the pursuers were mounted, or perhaps owing to the incumbrance of the women and baggage, they were overtaken near Jericho, when just within sight of the river. A few of the people only remained round the person of the king. The rest fled in all directions, so that he was easily taken.

Nebuchadnezzar himself was then at Riblah, at the upper end of the valley of Lebanon, some thirty-five miles beyond Baalbek, and therefore about ten days' journey from Jerusalem. Thither Zedekiah and his sons were despatched; his daughters were kept at Jerusalem, and shortly after fell into the hands of the notorious Ishmael at Mizpah. When he was brought before Nebuchadnezzar, the great king reproached him in the severest terms, first for breaking his oath of allegiance, and next for ingratitude (Josephus). He then, with a refinement of cruelty characteristic of those cruel times, ordered his sons to be killed before him, and lastly his own eyes to be thrust out. See EYE. He was loaded with brazen fetters, and at a later period taken to Babylon, where he died. We are not told whether he was allowed to communicate with his brother Jehoiachin, who at that time was also in captivity there; nor do we know the time of his death; but from the omission of his name in the statement of Jehoiakim's release by Evil-Merodach, twenty-six years after the fall of Jerusalem, it is natural to infer that by that time Zedekiah's sufferings had ended.

The fact of his interview with Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, and his being carried blind to Babylon, reconciles two predictions of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, which at the time of their delivery must have appeared conflicting, and which Josephus indeed particularly states Zedekiah alleged as his reason for not giving more heed to Jeremiah. The former of these (Jer. xxxii, 4) states that Zedekiah shall "speak with the king of Babylon mouth to mouth, and his eyes shall behold his eyes;" the latter (Ezek. xii, 13), that "he shall be brought to Babylon, yet shall he not see it, though he die there." The whole of this prediction of Ezekiel, whose prophecies appear to have been delivered at Babylon (i, 1-3; xl, 1), is truly remarkable as describing almost exactly the circumstances of Zedekiah's flight.

4. A son of Jehoiachin or Jeconiah, and grandson of Jehoiakim, king of Judah (1 Chron. iii, 16). B.C. 598 or later. As nothing further is recorded of him, and he is not mentioned subsequently among the royal lineage (ver. 17), Keil conjectures (Comment. ad loc.) that he may have died prior to the deportation of the royal family; but in that case he must have been only an infant.

5. The son of Maaseiah, a false prophet in Babylon among the captives who were taken with Jeconiah (Jer. xxix, 21, 22). He was denounced in the letter of Jeremiah (595) for having, with Ahab the son of Kolaiah, buoyed up the people with false hopes, and for profane and flagitious conduct. Their names were to become a by-word, and their terrible fate a warning. Of this fate we have no direct intimation, or of the manner in which they incurred it; the prophet simply pronounces that they should fall into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar and be burned to death. In the Targum of R. Joseph on 2 Chron. xxviii, 3, the story is told that Joshua the son of Jozadak the high-priest was cast into the furnace of fire with Ahab and Zedekiah, but that, while they were consumed, he was saved for his righteousness' sake.

6. The first named of the princes who sealed the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x, 1, A. V. "Zikijah"). B.C. 410.

Zēb. See WOLF.

Ze'ēb (Heb. Zēb, זֶב, wolf, as often; Sept. δ Ζήβ, Vulg. Zeb), one of the two "princes" (נְסִיכִים) of Midian in the great invasion of Israel—inferior to the "kings" Zebah and Zalmunna. He is always named with Oreb (Judg. vii, 25; viii, 3; Ps. lxxxiii, 11). The name signifies in Hebrew "wolf," just as Oreb does "crow," and the two are appropriate enough to the customs of predatory warriors, who delight in conferring such names on their chiefs. Zeeb and Oreb were not slain at the first rout of the Arabs below the spring of Harod, but at a later stage of the struggle, probably in crossing the Jordan at a ford farther down the river, near the passes which descend from Mount Ephraim. An enormous mass of their followers perished with them. See OREB. Zeeb, the wolf, was brought to bay in a winepress which in later times bore his name—"the winepress of Zeeb" (נֶחֱם זֶב; Sept. Ἰακεφζήφ v. r. Ἰακεφζήβ, Vulg. Torcular Zeb). Down the Jordan valley, overlooking the plain of Jericho, is a sharp peak, still known as Ash el-Ghorab, i. e. "the Raven's, or Oreb's, Peak." Five miles north-west of this is a wady and mound known as Triveel el-Diab, i. e. "the Wolf's, or Zeeb's, Den," which Tristram accepts as the required locality (Bible Places, p. 230). Rabbi Schwarz's suggestion (Palest. p. 231) is inapposite.

Zekukith. See CRYSTAL.

Ze'lah (Heb. Tsela', זֶלָּא [in pause, זֶלָּא, in Sam.], a rib; Sept. in Josh. Σηλά, in Sam. Πλευρά), a city in the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xviii, 28, where it is mentioned in the south-western section between Taralah and Ha-Eleph); it contained the family tomb of Kish, the father of Saul (2 Sam. xxi, 14), in which the bones of Saul and Jonathan, and also apparently of the two sons and five grandsons of Saul sacrificed to Jehovah on the hill of Gibeah, at last found their resting-place (comp. ver. 13). The ancient geographers seem ignorant of the locality (Reland, Palest. p. 1058); but modern travellers are inclined to identify it with Beit Jala (Wilson, Lands of the Bible, i, 401; Bonar, Mission, p. 234), a considerable Christian village opposite Rachel's Tomb (Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii, 2 sq.). The suggestion of rabbi Schwarz (Palest. p. 128) is too vague. Lieut. Conder's suggestion of Rumman is equally a venture (Tent Work in Palest. ii, 340). See ZELZAH.

Ze'lek (Heb. Tse'lek, זֶלֶק, fissure; Sept. Σελήκη and Σβλεγι v. r. Ἐλέ and Σελή), an Ammonite, one of David's thirty heroes (2 Sam. xxiii, 37; 1 Chron. xi, 39). B.C. 1046. See DAVID.

Zeloph'ehad (Heb. Tselophchud', זֶלּוֹפְחָד; of uncertain etymology; Sept. Σαλπαῖδ v. r. Σαλφαῖδ, etc.), son of Hephher, son of Gilead, son of Machir, son of Manasseh (Josh. xvii, 3). B.C. ante 1618. He was apparently the second son of his father, Hephher (1 Chron. vii, 15); though Simon and others, following the interpretation of the rabbins, and under the impression that the etymology of his name indicates a first-born, explain the term זֶלּוֹפְחָד as meaning that his lot came up second. Zelophehad came out of Egypt with Moses; and all that we know of him is that he took no part in Korah's rebellion, but that he died in the wilderness, as did the whole of that generation (Numb.

xiv, 35; xxvii, 8). On his death without male heirs, his five daughters, just after the second numbering in the wilderness, came before Moses and Eleazar to claim the inheritance of their father in the tribe of Manasseh. The claim was admitted by divine direction, and a law was promulgated, to be of general application, that if a man died without sons his inheritance should pass to his daughters (xxvi, 33; xxvii, 1-11); and this led to a further enactment (ch. xxxvi), that such heiresses should not marry out of their own tribe—a regulation which the five daughters of Zelophehad complied with, being all married to sons of Manasseh, so that Zelophehad's inheritance continued in the tribe of Manasseh. The law of succession as exemplified in the case of Zelophehad is treated at length by Selden (De Success. ch. xxii, xxiii). See INHERITANCE.

Zelo'tēs (Ζηλωτής, an epithet of the apostle Simon (Luke vi, 15; Acts i, 13) to distinguish him from Simon Peter. In the parallel lists of Matt. x, 4; Mark iii, 18, he is called Simon the Cananite (Κανανίτης, A. V. erroneously "Canaanite"), this being a transliteration of the Heb. or Aramaean זֶלֶן, zeul, of which the Greek title is a translation. The word denotes a zealot in general (1 Cor. xiv, 12; Tit. ii, 14; 1 Pet. iii, 13), especially in behalf of Jewish law and institutions (Acts xxi, 20; xxii, 3; Gal. i, 14). Probably there were already extant in the time of Christ, when this epithet was given to Simon, the germs of the sect or party afterwards thus designated, the members of which professed great attachment to Judaism, and, under pretext of punishing by informal trial and execution those guilty of infringing the observances of the national religion, perpetrated great excesses (Josephus, War, iv, 8, 9; v, 1, 4; vi, 3; vii, 8, 1). See SIMON.

Zel'zah (Heb. Tseltach', זֶלְזָח, shadow from the sun, or, by reduplication from זֶלְזָח, to send; Sept. ἀλόμενος μέγала, Vulg. meridies), a place in the border of Benjamin, mentioned by Samuel when sending Saul home from Ramah: "Thou shalt find two men by Rachel's sepulchre, in the border of Benjamin, at Zel-zah" (1 Sam. x, 2). Rachel's sepulchre stands on the side of the road leading from Bethlehem to Jerusalem, about a mile distant from the former. Westward of the sepulchre, in full view across the valley, and not much over half a mile distant, is the village of Beit Jala, which may be identical with Zelzah. The names bear considerable resemblance to each other and the position agrees with the sacred narrative (Wilson, Lands of the Bible, i, 401). The Sept. rendering of Zelzah is remarkable. It makes it an expression of joy on the part of the men who announced the finding of the asses—"Thou shalt meet two men leaping violently." But dean Stanley's remark on this is surely a rash criticism, that the Hebrew text "cannot be relied upon" (Sin. and Pal. p. 222). The Greek rendering in this case apparently rests upon a reading זֶלְזָח, which indicates a possible etymology of the word=double shade. The Talmud has numerous explanations, the favorite one being that Zelzah was Jerusalem—"the shadow" (צל) of God." Something of this kind seems to be at the basis of the rendering of the Vulg. The essential part of the name is thus rendered more closely congruent with that of the above Arabic village, and at the same time with that of ZELAH (q. v.), which must have lain in the same vicinity. Rabbi Schwarz suggests another location less apposite (Palest. p. 158). See SAUL.

Zemara'im (Heb. Tsemara'yim, זֶמְרַיִם, double fleece of wool, or perh. the dual of same base as Zemara'ite [q. v.]), the name of two localities in Palestine.

1. (Sept. Σεμρίμ v. r. Σάρα; Vulg. Semara'im.) One of the ancient towns in the territory allotted to Benjamin (Josh. xviii, 22), where it is grouped in the eastern section of the tribe, and named between Beth-arabah and Bethel; and it would therefore appear to have been situated either in the Jordan valley (Arabah) or on the mountain declivities between it and Bethel. About five miles north of Jericho, in the western edge of the valley of the Jordan, are the ruins of a small town or village, strewn over a low hill, and called Khurbet es-Sumrah, which may be regarded as the modern representative of the old town of Benjamin (Seetzen, Reisen, vol. iv, map; Robinson, Bibl. Res. i, 569; iii, 292, note; Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 355; De Sauley, Dead Sea, ii, 20, 26; Schwarz, Palest. p. 125). Though little remains above the ground, there are many extensive quarries of sandstone beneath, which are proofs of large buildings once existing in the vicinity (Tristram, Bible Places, p. 108).

2. (Sept. Σομόρων; Vulg. Semerom.) A mountain (רֹם) or eminence mentioned in 2 Chron. xiii, 4 as being "in Mount Ephraim," that is to say, within the general district of the highlands of that great tribe. It appears to have been close to the scene of the engagement mentioned in the narrative, which again may be inferred to have been south of Bethel and Ephraim (ver. 19). It may be said, in passing, that a position so far south is no contradiction to its being in Mount Ephraim, which extended into the contiguous territory of Benjamin. See RAMAH. It probably lay adjacent to the above-named town, from which it appears to have derived its name (Reland, Palest. p. 1058).

Zem'arite (Heb. with the art. hats-Tsemari', צִמְרִי, evidently a patronymic or rather patril from Zemer [see below]; Sept. ὁ Σαμαριῶς; Vulg. Samaritanus), the general designation of one of the Hamitic tribes who in the genealogical table of Gen. x (ver. 18) and 1 Chron. i (ver. 16) are represented as "sons of Canaan." They are named between the Arvadite, or people of Ruad, and the Hamathite, or people of Hamah. The old interpreters (Jerusalem Targum, Arabic version, etc.) place them at Emessa, the modern Hama. Michaelis (Spicileg. ii, 51), revolting at the want of similarity between the two names (which is perhaps the strongest argument in favor of the old identification), proposes to locate them at Sumra, the Simyra (Συμυρα) or Simyru (Σιμυρος) of the classical geographers (Assemani, Biblioth. Orient. i, 504), located on the Phœnician river Eleutherus (Ptolemy, v, 15, 4; Pliny, v, 17; Mela, i, 12, 3), which name is mentioned by Shaw (p. 234) as attached to a site of ruins near Arka, on the west coast of Syria, ten or eleven miles above Tripoli (comp. Buckingham, ii, 415). On the French map of the Lebanon (Carte du Liban, etc., 1862) this place appears as Kobbet oum Shoumra, and lies between Arka and the Mediterranean, two kilometres from the latter and five and a half from the former. Beyond, however, the resemblance in the names, and the proximity of Ruad and Arka, the probable seats of the Arvadites and Arkites, and the consequent inference that the original seat of the Zemarites must have been somewhere in this direction, there is nothing to prove that Sumra or Shumra has any connection with the Tsemarites of the ancient records. The name is more likely to have sprung from the locality in the eastern declivity of Mount Ephraim or Benjamin, elsewhere designated as ZEMARAIM (q. v.). The identification by the Sept. and Vulg. of both these places with the city of Samaria is evidently a mere conjecture or false transliteration.

Zemi'ra (Heb. Zemirah', זְמִירָה, music, as in Isa. xxiv, 16, etc.; Sept. Ζεμίρα v. r. Ζαμρία and Ἀμαρία; Vulg. Zamira), first named of the nine sons of Becher son of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii, 8). B.C. post 1874.

Ze'nán (Heb. Tsenan', זֶנָן, pointed, if this be the proper form of the name; Sept. Ζεννάμ v. r. Ζεννά; Vulg. Sanan), a town in the lowland district of Judah (Josh. xv, 37), where it is named before Hadashah and Migdal-gad in the western group of the tribe. See JUDAH. Accordingly, a few miles south of the present Mejdél is a small village called Jenif, which is probably the modern representative of Zenan. It is generally supposed that Zenan is the same place which the prophet Micah calls Zaanán (Mic. i, 11; see Reland, Palest. p. 1058; Keil and Delitzsch, On Josh. xv, 37). Knobel supposes this last to be identical with the ruin of es-Senat, near Beit Jibrin (Tobler, Dritte Wanderung, p. 124). Schwarz (Palest. p. 108) proposes to identify Zenan with "the village Zan-abra, situated two and a half English miles south-east of Mareslah." By this he doubtless intends the place which in the lists of Robinson (Bibl. Res. [1st ed.], vol. iii, app. p. 117) is called es-Sendábirah, and in Tobler's Dritte Wanderung (p. 149), es-Sennábereh. The latter traveller in his map places it about two and a half miles due east of Marash (Maresha). But both these latter identifications are more than doubtful.

Ze'nas (Ζηνᾶς, a contraction from Ζηνόδωρος, as Ἀπρεμᾶς from Ἀπρεμίδωρος, Νυμφᾶς from Νυμφόδωρος, and probably Ἐπυᾶς from Ἐπυμόδωρος), a believer, and, as may be inferred from the context, a preacher of the Gospel, who is mentioned in Tit. iii, 18 in connection with Apollos, and, together with him, is there commended by Paul to the care and hospitality of Titus and the Cretan brethren. A.D. cir. 59. He is further described as "the lawyer" (τὸν νομικόν). It is impossible to determine with certainty whether we are to infer from this designation that Zenas was a Roman jurist-consult or a Jewish doctor. Grotius accepts the former alternative, and thinks that he was a Greek who had studied Roman law. The New-Test. usage of νομικός leads rather to the other inference. Tradition has been somewhat busy with the name of Zenas. The Synopsis de Vita et Morte Prophetarum, Apostolorum, et Discipulorum Domini, ascribed to Dorotheus of Tyre, makes him to have been one of the "seventy-two" disciples, and subsequently bishop of Diospolis, in Palestine (Bibl. Patr. iii, 150). The "seventy-two" disciples of Dorotheus are, however, a mere string of names picked out of salutations and other incidental notices in the New Test. The Greek menologies on the festival of SS. Bartholomew and Titus (Aug. 25) refer to a certain Life of Titus, ascribed to Zenas, which is also quoted for the supposed conversion of the younger Pliny (comp. Fabricius, Codex Apoc. N. T. ii, 831, 2). The association of Zenas with Titus, in Paul's epistle to the latter, sufficiently accounts for the forgery.

Zeno, a Greek philosopher, was born at Elea, in Southern Italy, about B.C. 490. He was a pupil of Parmenides, and lived at Elea all his life, with the exception of occasional visits to Athens, where he had many of the wealthy citizens for his disciples. He is said to have engaged in a conspiracy against Nearchus, the tyrant of Elea, who captured him and put him to death by cruel torture. For an account of his philosophy, see ELEATIC SCHOOL.

Zeno THE STOIC. See STOICS.

Zephani'ah (Heb. Tsephanyah', צְפַנְיָה, [in the prolonged form Tsephanyah'u, צְפַנְיָהוּ, 2 Kings xxv, 18], hidden of Jehovah; Sept. Σοφονίας v. r. [in 1 Chron.] Σαφονίας, Vulg. Sophonias), the name of four Hebrews.

1. A Kohathite Levite, son of Tahath and father of Azariah, in the ancestry of the prophet Samuel (q. v.) and of Heman (1 Chron. vi, 36 [Heb. 21]); the same elsewhere (ver. 24 [9]) called URIEL (q. v.) the father of Uzziel.

2. A prophet of whom we have no information beyond what his book furnishes. In this (Zeph. i, 1) he is said to have been "the son of Cushi, the son of Gedaliah, the son of Amariah, the son of Hizkiah," which last is usually regarded as the same with king Hezekiah. If so, he lived B.C. cir. 620. With this agrees the date of his prophecy there given; namely, in the reign of Josiah. We do not elsewhere, however, read of any such son of Hezekiah as Amariah, and, so far as the record and probability go, Manasseh was his only son. See ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF.

3. The son of Maaseiah (Jer. xxi, 1) and sagan, or second priest, in the reign of Zedekiah. He succeeded Jehoiada (xxix, 25, 26), and was probably a ruler of the Temple, whose office it was, among others, to punish pretenders to the gift of prophecy. In this capacity he was appealed to by Shemaiah the Nehelamite, in a letter from Babylon, to punish Jeremiah (ver. 29). Twice was he sent from Zedekiah to inquire of Jeremiah the issue of the siege of the city by the Chaldeans (xxi, 1), and to implore him to intercede for the people (xxxvii, 3). On the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuzaradan, he was taken with Seraiah the high-priest and others, and slain at Riblah (lvi, 24, 27; 2 Kings xxv, 18, 21). B.C. 588.

4. Father of Josiah 2 (Zech. vi, 10), and of Hen, according to the reading of the received text of Zech. vi, 14 as given in the A. V. B.C. ante 519. See JOSIAH.

ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF, the ninth in order of the minor prophets, both in the Hebrew and Greek copies of the Scriptures (Jerome, Prolog. ad Paul. et Eustoch.). Besides his genuine prophecy, there was in the ancient Christian Church an apocryphal book ascribed to Zephaniah the prophet, and quoted by some of the fathers under the name of his Ἀνάληψις or Προφήτεια. See APOCRYPHA.

I. Author.—1. The name of this prophet has been variously explained. Disputes upon it arose as early as the times of Jerome, for in his Commentary on this book he says, "Nomen Sophoniæ, alii speculam, alii arcanum Dei, transtulerunt." The word was thus derived either from צִפְנִי, he watched, or צִפְנִי, he hid, with the common affix יָהּ, i. e. Jah. The old father made it a matter of indifference which etymon he adopted, as both, according to him, give virtually the same sense—the commission of a prophet being virtually that of a watchman or seer, and the burden of his message some secret revealed to him by God. Abarbanel (Pref. in Ezek.) adheres to the latter mode of derivation, and the Pseudo-Dorotheus, following the former, translates the prophet's name by the Greek participle σκορῶν. Hiller and Simonis differ also in a similar way; Hiller, taking the term from צִפְנִי, renders it "abscondit se, i. e. delituit Jehovah" (Onomast. s. v.), as if the name had contained a mystic reference to the character of the age in which the prophet lived, when God had withdrawn himself from his apostate people; but Simonis (Onomast. V. T.) gives the true signification, one sanctioned by Gesenius—"abscondit, i. e. custodivit Jehovah," Jehovah hath guarded, the verb צִפְנִי being used of divine protection in Ps. xxvii, 5 and lxxxiii, 4. The name seems to have been a common one among the Jews.

2. Parentage.—Contrary to usual custom, the pedigree of the prophet is traced back for four generations—"the son of Cushi, the son of Gedaliah, the son of Amariah, the son of Hizkiah." This formal record of his lineage has led many to suppose that Zephaniah had sprung from a noble stock (Cyril, Pref. ad Zeph.), and the occurrence of the highest name in the list, which in the Hebrew text is spelled and pointed in the same way as that rendered Hezekiah in the books of Kings and Chronicles, has induced some to identify it with that of the good king Hezekiah, and to pronounce the prophet a cadet of the royal house of Judah. Kimchi is very cautious in his opinion, and leaves the point undecided; but Aben-Ezra, ever ready to magnify his nation, at once concludes that Zephaniah was descended from Hezekiah; and his opinion has been followed by Huet (Demonstrat. Evangel. Propos. iv, 303), and partially by Eichhorn (Einleit. § 593). The conjecture has little else to recommend it than the mere occurrence of the royal name. But it was not a name confined to royalty; and had it been the name of the pious monarch to which Zephaniah's genealogy is traced, certainly his official designation, "king of Judah," would have been subjoined in order to prevent mistake. Such an addition is found in connection with his name in Prov. xxv, 1 and Isa. xxxviii, 9. It forms no objection to this statement to affirm that the phrase "king of Judah" is added to Josiah, and to avoid repetition may have been omitted after Hizkiah, for such regard to euphony, such finical delicacy, is no feature of Hebrew composition. The argument of Carpzov (Introd. p. 414), copied by Rosenmüller (Proœmium in Zeph.), against the supposed connection of the prophet with the blood royal is of no great weight. These critics say that from Hezekiah to Josiah, in whose reign Zephaniah flourished, are only three generations, while from Hezekiah to Zephaniah four are reckoned in the first verse of the prophecy. But as Hezekiah reigned twenty-nine years, and his successor sat on the throne no less than fifty-five years, there is room enough in such a period for the four specified descents; and Amariah, though not heir to the crown, may have been much older than his youthful brother Manasseh, who was crowned at the age of twelve. As there was at least another Zephaniah, a conspicuous personage at the time of the Captivity, the parentage of the prophet may have been recounted so minutely to prevent any reader from confounding the two individuals. The descent of the prophet from king Hezekiah, therefore, is not in itself improbable, and the fact that the pedigree terminates with that name points to a personage of rank and importance. Late critics and commentators generally acquiesce in this hypothesis, viz. Eichhorn, Hitzig, F. Ad. Strauss (Vaticinia Zephaniæ [Berlin, 1843]), Hävernick, Keil, and Bleek (Einleitung in das Alte Testament).

The Jews absurdly reckon that here, as in other superscriptions, the persons recorded as a prophet's ancestors were themselves endowed with the prophetic spirit. The so-called Epiphanius (De Vitis Prophet. ch. xix) asserts that Zephaniah was of the tribe of Simeon, of the hill Sarabatha, ἀπὸ ὄρους Σαραβᾶθᾶ. The existence of the prophet is known only from his oracles, and these have no biographical sketches; so that our knowledge of this man of God comprises only the fact and the results of his inspiration. It may be safely inferred, however, that he labored with Josiah in the pious work of re-establishing the worship of Jehovah in the land.

II. Date.—It is recorded (ch. i) that the word of the Lord came to him "in the days of Josiah the son of Amon, king of Judah." We have reason for supposing that he flourished during the earlier portion of Josiah's reign. In the second chapter (ver. 13-15) he foretells the doom of Nineveh, and the fall of that ancient city happened about the eighteenth year of Josiah. In the commencement of his oracles, also, he denounces various forms of idolatry, and specially the remnant of Baal. The reformation of Josiah began in the twelfth and was completed in the eighteenth year of his reign. So thorough was his extirpation of the idolatrous rites and hierarchy which defiled his kingdom that he burned down the groves, dismissed the priesthood, threw down the altars, and made dust of the images of Baalim. Zephaniah must have prophesied prior to this religious revolution, while some remains of Baal were yet secreted in the land, or between the twelfth and eighteenth years of the royal reformer. So Hitzig (Die 12 kleinen Prophet.) and Movers (Chronik, p. 234) place him; while Eichhorn, Bertholdt, and Jäger incline to give him a somewhat later date. At all events, he flourished between the years B.C. 642 and 611; and the portion of his prophecy which refers to the destruction of the Assyrian empire must have been delivered prior to the year B.C. 625, the year in which Nineveh fell (Henderson, On the Minor Prophets, p. 326). The publication of these oracles was therefore contemporary with a portion of those of Jeremiah, for the word of the Lord came to him in the thirteenth year of the reign of Josiah.

Indeed, the Jewish tradition is, that Zephaniah had for his colleagues Jeremiah and the prophetess Huldah, the former fixing his sphere of labor in the thoroughfares and market-places, the latter exercising her honorable vocation in the college in Jerusalem (Carpzov, Introd. p. 415). Köster (Die Propheten, iii) endeavors to prove that Zephaniah was posterior to Habakkuk. His arguments from similarity of diction are very trivial, and the more so when we reflect that all circumstances combine in inducing us to fix the period of Habakkuk (q. v.) in the reign of Jehoiakim, immediately before the Chaldean invasion. In the present book Nineveh is represented as in a state of peace and prosperity, while the notices of Jerusalem touch upon the same tendencies to idolatry and crime which are condemned by the contemporary Jeremiah. It is not impossible, moreover, that the prophecy was delivered about the time when the Scythians overran the empires of Western Asia, extending their devastations to Palestine. The king's children, who are spoken of in ch. i, 8 as addicted to foreign habits, could not have been sons of Josiah, who was but eight years old at his accession, but were probably his brothers or near relatives. The remnant of Baal (ch. i, 4) implies that some partial reformation had previously taken place, while the notices of open idolatry are incompatible with the state of Judah after the discovery of the Book of the Law.

III. Contents.—In ch. i the utter desolation of Judæa is predicted as a judgment for idolatry, and neglect of the Lord, the luxury of the princes, and the violence and deceit of their dependents (ver. 3-9). The prosperity, security, and insolence of the people are contrasted with the horrors of the day of wrath; the assaults upon the fenced cities and high towers, and the slaughter of the people (ver. 10-18). Ch. ii is a call to repentance (ver. 1-3), with prediction of the ruin of the cities of the Philistines, and the restoration of the house of Judah after the visitation (ver. 4-7). Other enemies of Judah, Moab, Ammon, are threatened with perpetual destruction, Ethiopia with a great slaughter, and Nineveh, the capital of Assyria, with desolation (ver. 8-15). In ch. iii the prophet addresses Jerusalem, which he reproves sharply for vice and disobedience, the cruelty of the princes and the treachery of the priests, and for their general disregard of warnings and visitations (ver. 1-7). He then concludes with a series of promises, the destruction of the enemies of God's people, the restoration of exiles, the extirpation of the proud and violent, and the permanent peace and blessedness of the poor and afflicted remnant who shall trust in the name of the Lord. These exhortations to rejoicing and exertion are mingled with intimations of a complete manifestation of God's righteousness and love in the restoration of his people (ver. 8-20).

It has been disputed what the enemies are with whose desolating inroads he threatens Judah. The ordinary and most probable opinion is that the foes whose period of invasion was "a day of the trumpet and alarm against the fenced cities and against the high towers" (ch. i, 16), were the Chaldeans. Hitzig especially, Cramer too, and Eichhorn, supposed the prophet to refer to a Scythian invasion, the history of which they imagine has been preserved by Herodotus (i, 105). But the general style of the oracle, and the sweeping vengeance which it menaces against Assyria, Philistia, Ammon, and Cush, as well as against Judah, by some great and unnamed power, point to the Chaldean expedition which, under Nebuchadnezzar, laid Jerusalem waste, and carried to Babylon its enslaved population. The contemporary prophecies of Jeremiah contemplate the musterings, onset, and devastations of the same victorious hosts. The former part of Zephaniah's prediction is "a day of clouds and of thick darkness," but in the closing section of it light is sown for the righteous: "The king of Israel, the Lord, is in the midst of thee; he will rejoice over thee with joy; he will rest in his love."

IV. Style.—We cannot by any means award so low a character to Zephaniah's style as is done by De Wette (Einleit. § 245), who describes it as being often heavy and tedious. It has not the sustained majesty of Isaiah, or the sublime and original energy of Joel: it has no prominent feature of distinction; yet its delineations are graphic, and many of its touches are bold and striking. For example, in the first chapter the prophet groups together in his descriptions of the national idolatry several characteristic exhibitions of its forms and worship. The verses are not tame and prosaic portraiture, but form a series of vivid sketches. The poet seizes on the more strange peculiarities of the heathen worship—uttering denunciations on the remnant of Baal, the worshippers of Chemarim—the star-adorsers, the devotees of Malcham, the fanatics who clad themselves in strange apparel, and those who in some superstitious mummery leaped upon the threshold (Bochart, Hieroz. c. 36). Not a few verses occur in the course of the prophecy which, in tone and dignity, are not unworthy to be associated with the more distinguished effusions of the Hebrew bards. A few paronomasias occur (i, 15 and ii, 1-4), and occasionally there is a peculiar repetition of a leading word in the formation of a climax (ii, 15).

Jahn (Introd. § 132) and Eichhorn assert that Zephaniah has borrowed to a considerable extent from the earlier prophets, especially from Isaiah; yet the similarity of such passages as Isa. xxxiv, 11 to Zeph. ii, 14, or Isa. xlvii, 8 to Zeph. ii, 15, or Isa. xviii, 1 to Zeph. iii, 10, or Isa. xvi, 6 to Zeph. ii, 8, is not sufficient evidence that Zephaniah was Isaiah's imitator. The clauses of resemblance are idiomatic in nature, and seem to have been of proverbial force and currency, so that both prophets may have taken them from the national usus loquendi. Coincidences of expression have also been noted between Zephaniah and some of his contemporaries, particularly Jeremiah (Eichhorn, Einleit. § 595; Rosenmüller, Proem. vi). Between Zeph. i, 5 and Jer. viii, 2 we can perceive little similarity of language, though the same superstitious custom is referred to, and a comparison of Zeph. i, 12 with Jer. xlviii, 11 leads to such a conclusion as we have already stated, as the phrase common to both passages—"settled on the lees"—must have been one in wide circulation in a wine country like Judæa. It was altogether groundless, therefore, in some of the older critics, such as Isidore and Schmidius (Prolegom. in Sophon.), to style Zephaniah the abbreviator of Jeremiah. Resemblances have also been traced between Zephaniah and Amos, and between him and his successor Ezekiel; but to call these imitations is rash indeed, if we reflect on the similarity of the topics discussed, and the peculiar range of imagery and phraseology which is common to Hebrew prophetic poetry, and which was the stereotyped language of the inspired brotherhood. The language of Zephaniah is pure: it has not the classic ease and elegance of the earlier compositions, but it wants the degenerate feebleness and Aramaic corruption of the succeeding æra. Zephaniah is not expressly quoted in the New Test.; but clauses and expressions occur which seem to have been formed from his prophecy (Zeph. iii, 9; Rom. xv, 6, etc.). He was, in fine, as Cyril of Alexandria terms him (Præfat. in Soph. tom. iii), "a true prophet, and filled with the Holy Ghost, and bringing his oracles from the mouth of God."

The chief characteristics of this book are the unity and harmony of the composition, the grace, energy, and dignity of its style, and the rapid and effective alternations of threats and promises. Its prophetic import is chiefly shown in the accurate predictions of the desolation which has fallen upon each of the nations denounced for their crimes; Ethiopia, which is menaced with a terrible invasion, being alone exempted from the doom of perpetual ruin. The general tone of the last portion is Messianic, but without any specific reference to the person of our Lord.

There has often been noticed in this prophecy a general or universal character, rather than specific predictions, though these are not entirely wanting. This tendency is in harmony with the position which Zephaniah was called to occupy in the course of divine providence; for he lived at the commencement of the period of the universal empires, which are represented by Daniel in detail, and exhibited as introductory to the kingdom of the Son of man. The Chaldean monarchy was rising with marvellous rapidity to universal empire, and was in preparation by the Lord to be the scourge of his own people as well as of the heathen nations; and in connection with their work Zephaniah saw the coming of the day of the Lord, the day of judgment, when all the earth should be devoured with the fire of his jealousy (ch. i, 18; iii, 8). But as earlier prophets, especially Joel and Isaiah, had already foreseen and declared this in connection with the work of the Assyrian monarchy, which only made a commencement and left the completion to its rival and heir at Babylon, we find the language and imagery of these earlier prophets continually referred to, adopted, or elaborated anew by Zephaniah and his contemporary Jeremiah, with whom he has much in common.

V. Commentaries.—The following are the special exegetical helps on this entire book exclusively: Luther, Commentarius (in Opp. vol. iv; also in Germ. in Werke); Bucer, Commentarius (Argent. 1528, 8vo); Selnecker, Auslegung (Leips. 1566, 4to); Cäsar, Predigten (Wittenb. 1603, 8vo); Tarnovius, Commentarius (Rost. 1623, 4to); Larenus, Tuba (Mediob. 1653, 8vo); Gebhardus, Vindicatio (Gryphan. 1701–2, 4to); Höcke, Auslegung [includ. Nah. and Hab.] (Frankf. 1710, 4to); Noltenius, Commentariolus [on ch. i] (Fr. ad O. 1719–24, 4to); Gebhardi, Erklärung (Fr. am O. 1728, 4to); Cramer, Scythische Denkmäler (Kiel, 1777, 8vo); Anton, Interpretatio [on ch. iii] (Gorl. 1811, 4to); Cölln, Observationes (Vratisl. 1818, 4to); Ewald, Erklärung (Erlang. 1827, 8vo); Strauss, Commentarius (Berol. 1843, 8vo); Robinson, Homilies (Lond. 1865, 8vo); Reinke, Erläuterung (Leips. 1868). See PROPHETS, MINOR.

Ze'phath (Heb. Tsephath', תִּפְתָּח, watch-tower; Sept. Σεφίθ v. r. Σεφίς and Σεφίρ; Vulg. Sephuath), the earlier name (according to the notice of Judg. i, 17) of a Canaanitish town, which after its capture and destruction was called by the Israelites HORMAH (q. v.).

According to rabbi Schwarz (Palest. p. 186), it is likewise mentioned in the Jerus. Talmud (Rosh hash-Shanah, ch. ii). See also ZIPH. Two identifications have been proposed for Zephath—that of Dr. Robinson with the well-known pass es-Sufâ, by which the ascent is made from the borders of the Arabah to the higher level of the “south country” (Bibl. Res. ii, 181), and that of Mr. Rowlands (Williams, Holy City, i, 464) with Sebâta, two and a half hours beyond Khalasa, on the road to Suez, and a quarter of an hour north of Rohébeh, or Ruheibeh. See also ZEPHATHAH.

1. The former of these Mr. Wilton (The Negeb, etc., p. 199, 200) has challenged, on account of the impracticability of the pass for the approach of the Israelites, and the inappropriateness of so rugged and desolate a spot for the position of a city of any importance. The question really forms part of a much larger one, which this is not the place to discuss—viz. the route by which the Israelites approached the Holy Land. See EXOD. But, in the meantime, it should not be overlooked that the attempt of the Israelites in question was an unsuccessful one, which is so far in favor of the steepness of the pass. It should also be borne in mind that both in ancient and modern times such difficult passes have in many cases been the chief thoroughfares in Palestine, and this one in particular has remained such to the present day. The argument from the nature of the site is one which might be brought with equal force against the existence of many others of the towns in this region.

2. On the identification of Mr. Rowlands some doubt has been thrown by the want of certainty as to the name and exact locality. Dr. Stewart (Tent and Khan, p. 205) heard of the name, but east of Khalasa instead of south, and this was in answer to a leading question—always a dangerous experiment with Arabs. The English engineers of the Ordnance Survey, however, found Sebaita in the vicinity indicated; namely, about fifteen miles south of Khalasa. Prof. Palmer gives a full description of the extensive ruins of the place (Desert of the Exodus, p. 315 sq.), and a plan of the town, with other details, may be found in the Quarterly Statement of the “Palestine Explor. Fund,” Jan. 1871, p. 3–73. Preferring, as we decidedly do, the location of Kadesh-barnea, on the edge of the Arabah, we should decide against the claims of this spot to be the Zephath of Scripture, notwithstanding the agreement in name and remains. See KADESH.

Pass of Sufâ. (From a photograph by the Editor. The dark spot half-way up the mountain is the travellers' caravan climbing the ascent.)

Zeph'athah (Heb. Tsepha'thah, צֶפְתָּה, watch-tower; Sept. κατὰ βορρᾶν; Josephus, Σαφθᾶ, Ant. viii, 12, 1; Vulg. Sephata), the name of a valley (צֶפְתָּה) where Asa joined battle with Zerah the Ethiopian (2 Chron. xiv, 10). It was "at," or rather "belonging to," Mare-shah (צֶפְתָּה לְמָרְשָׁה; Josephus, οὐκ ἄπωθεν). This would seem to exclude the possibility of its being, as suggested by Robinson (Bibl. Res. ii, 31), at Tell es-Safieh, which is not less than eight miles from Marash, the modern representative of Mare-shah. There is a deep valley which runs past the latter place down to Beit Jibrin, and thence into the plain of Philistia. This, perhaps, may be the valley of Zephathah (Porter, Handbook, p. 258). Some, however, understand the name Zephathah to be only that of Zephath (q. v.), with ת directive, and render it "the valley towards Zephath."

Zepheth. See PITCH.

Ze'phi (1 Chron. i, 36). See ZEPHO.

Ze'pho (Heb. Tsepho', צֶפֹּה, watch-tower; Sept. Σωφάρ; Vulg. Sephu), third named of the five sons of Eliphaz the son of Esau (Gen. xxxvi, 11), and one of the Idumæan "dukes" (ver. 15). B.C. considerably post 1927. In the parallel passage (1 Chron. i, 36) the name is written Zephi (Heb. Tsephi', צֶפִּי; Sept. Σωφάρ; Vulg. Sephi).

Ze'phon (Heb. Tsephon', צֶפֹּן, watch; Sept. Σαφών; Vulg. Sephon), first named of the seven sons of Gad (Numb. xxvi, 15) and progenitor of the family of the Zephonites (Heb. with the art. hats-Tsephoni', הַצִּפְוֹנִי; Sept. ὁ Σαφώνι; Vulg. Sephonite). In Gen. xlv, 16 his name is written Ziphion (Heb. Tsiphon', צִפְיוֹן; Sept. Σαφών; Vulg. Sephion). B.C. 1874.

Zephyrinus, bishop of Rome, succeeded Victor about A.D. 199-201, and filled his office (according to Eusebius) during eighteen years. He died in 217. His pontificate falls in the period when Montanistic and Monarchian influences were struggling to obtain control of the Church; and although his own personality was by no means imposing, his rule became important through the unlimited power which he permitted Calixtus I (q. v.) to acquire. Zephyrinus's original attitude was hostile towards Montanism; and though the influence of Hippolytus (q. v.) compelled the gradual exclusion of the Monarchians from the Church, they were accorded kindly treatment. The peace of the Church was in this way preserved, in outward appearance, while Zephyrinus lived. The more energetic administration of his successor, Calixtus, produced a formal breach, and thus conferred prominence upon Zephyrinus's pontificate as being the close of the first period of the greatness of the Roman Church. Eusebius furnishes a few scanty notices on Zephyrinus in the Hist. Eccles. (bk. v and vi), which are supplemented by the ninth book of Hippolytus (Contr. Heres.). The latter work called forth Bunsen's book Hippolytus u. seine Zeit, a production of but little value, and Döllinger's Hippolytus u. Callistus, which is not impartial. Greater importance attaches to Baur's brief remarks in his work on the Christianity of the first three centuries, and to Ritschl, in Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche (2d ed.). See also Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Ze'rah (Heb. Ze'rach, זֶרַח [in pause Za'rach, זָרַח, 1 Chron. ii, 4; "Zarah," Gen. xxxviii, 30], rising of the sun; Sept. usually Ζαρά, but sometimes Ζαρέ, Ζαρέ, etc.), the name of several Hebrews and one foreigner.

1. Second named of the three sons of Reuel, son of Esau (Gen. xxxvi, 13; 1 Chron. i, 37), and one of the "dukes" or phylarchs of the Edomites (Gen. xxxvi, 17). B.C. considerably post 1927. Jobab of Bozrah, one of the early kings of Edom, perhaps belonged to his family (ver. 38; 1 Chron. i, 44).

2. Twin son with his elder brother Pharez of Judah and Tamar (Gen. xxxviii, 30; 1 Chron. ii, 6; "Zara," Matt. i, 3). B.C. cir. 1895. His descendants were called Zarhites, Ezrahites, and Izrahites (Numb. xxvi, 20; 1 Kings iv, 31; 1 Chron. xxvii, 8, 11), and continued at least down to the time of Zerubbabel (ix, 6; Neh. xi, 24). Nothing is related of Zerah individually beyond the peculiar circumstances of his birth (Gen. xxxviii, 27-30), concerning which see Heidegger, Hist. Patriarch. xviii, 28; Geddes, Critical Remarks, p. 126, 127.

3. Fourth named of the five sons of Simeon (1 Chron. iv, 24), and founder of the family of Zarhites (Numb. xxvi, 13). B.C. 1874. In Gen. xli, 10 he is called ZOHAR.

4. A Gershonite Levite, son of Iddo (or Adaiah) and father of Jeaterai (1 Chron. vi, 21, 41 [Heb. vi, 26]). B.C. ante 1043.

5. The Ethiopian or Cushite (צִרְחָא) king who invaded Judah, and was defeated by Asa (2 Chron. xiv, 9). The incident derives great importance from the synchronism thus afforded between Biblical and other history.

1. The Name.—In its form Zerah is identical with the Hebrew proper name above. It has been supposed to represent the Egyptian Usarken, possibly pronounced Usarcken, a name almost certainly of Shemitic origin. See SHISHAK. The difference is great, but may be partly accounted for if we suppose that the Egyptian deviates from the original Shemitic form and that the Hebrew represents that form, or that a further deviation than would have been made was the result of the similarity of the Hebrew proper name Zerah. So, צִרְחָא, even if pronounced Sewa or Seva, is more remote from Shebek or Shebetek than Zerah from Usarken. It may be conjectured that these forms resemble those of Memphis, Moph, Noph, which evidently represent current pronunciation, probably of Shemites.

2. The Date.—The war between Asa and Zerah appears to have taken place soon after the tenth (2 Chron. xiv, 1) or early in the fifteenth year of Asa (xv, 10). It therefore occurred in about the same year of Usarken II, fourth king of the twenty-second dynasty, who began to reign about the same time as the king of Judah. We may therefore date the invasion in B.C. 939.

3. The Event.—The first ten years of Asa's reign were undisturbed by war. Then Asa took counsel with his subjects, and walled and fortified the cities of Judah. He also maintained an army of 580,000 men, 300,000 spearmen of Judah, and 280,000 archers of Benjamin. This great force was probably the whole number of men able to bear arms (2 Chron. xiv, 1-8). At length the anticipated danger came. Zerah the Ethiopian, with a mighty army of a million, Cushim and Lubim, with three hundred chariots, invaded the kingdom, and advanced unopposed in the field as far as Mareshah. As the invaders afterwards retreated by way of Gerar, and Mareshah lay on the west of the hill-country of Judah, where it rises out of the Philistine plain, in the line of march from Egypt to Jerusalem, it cannot be doubted that they came out of Egypt. Between the border on the side of Gerar and Mareshah lay no important city but Gath. Gath and Mareshah were both fortified by Rehoboam before the invasion of Shishak (xi, 8), and were no doubt captured and probably dismantled by that king (comp. xii, 4), whose list of conquered towns, etc., shows that he not only took some strong towns, but that he subdued the country in detail. A delay in the capture of Gath, where the warlike Philistines may have opposed a stubborn resistance, would have removed the only obstacle on the way to Mareshah, thus securing the retreat that was afterwards made by this route. From Mareshah or its immediate neighborhood was a route to Jerusalem, presenting no difficulties but those of a hilly country; for not one important town is known to have lain between the capital and this outpost of the tribe of Judah. The invading army had swarmed across the border and devoured the Philistine fields before Asa could march to meet it. The distance from Gerar, or the southwestern border of Palestine, to Mareshah was not much greater than from Mareshah to Jerusalem, and, considering the nature of the tracts, would have taken about the same time to traverse; and only such delay as would have been caused by the sieges of Gath and Mareshah could have enabled Asa hastily to collect a levy and march to relieve the beleaguered town or hold the passes. "In the valley of Zephathah at Mareshah" the two armies met. We cannot perfectly determine the site of the battle. Mareshah, according to the Onomasticon, lay within two miles of Eleutheropolis, and Dr. Robinson has reasonably conjectured its position to be marked by a remarkable "tell," or artificial mound, a mile and a half south of the site of the latter town. Its signification, "that which is at the head," would scarcely suit a position at the opening of a valley. But it seems that a narrow valley terminates, and a broad one commences, at the supposed site. The valley of Zephathah, "the watch-tower," is supposed by Dr. Robinson to be the latter, a broad wady, descending from Eleutheropolis in a northwesterly direction towards Tell es-Safieh, in which last name he is disposed to trace the old appellation (Bibl. Res. ii, 31). The two have no connection whatever, and Robinson's conjecture is extremely hazardous. See ZEPHATHAH. If this identification be correct, we must suppose that Zerah retired from before Mareshah towards the plain, that he might use his "chariots and horsemen" with effect, instead of entangling them in the narrow valleys leading towards Jerusalem. From the prayer of Asa we may judge that, when he came upon the invading army, he saw its hugeness, and so that, as he descended through a valley, it lay spread out beneath him. The Egyptian monuments enable us to picture the general disposition of Zerah's army. The chariots formed the first corps in a single or double line; behind them, massed in phalanxes, were heavy-armed troops; probably on the flanks stood archers and horsemen in lighter formations. Asa, marching down a valley, must have attacked in a heavy column; for none but the most highly disciplined troops can form line from column in the face of an enemy. His spearmen of Judah would have composed this column: each bank of the valley would have been occupied by the Benjamite archers, like those who came to David, "helpers of the war, armed with bows, and [who] could use both the right hand and the left in [hurling] stones and [shooting] arrows out of a bow" (1 Chron. xii, 1, 2). No doubt the Ethiopian, confident in his numbers, disinclined to attack the Hebrews or clear the heights, but waited in the broad valley, or the plain. Asa's prayer before the battle is full of the noble faith of the age of the Judges: "Lord [it is] alike to thee to help, whether the strong or the weak: help us, O Lord our God; for we rest on thee, and in thy name we go against this multitude. O Lord, thou [art] our God; let not man prevail against thee." From the account of Abijah's defeat of Jeroboam, we may suppose that the priests sounded their trumpets, and the men of Judah descended with a shout (2 Chron. xiii, 14, 15). The hills and mountains were the favorite camping-places of the Hebrews, who usually rushed down upon their more numerous or better-disciplined enemies in the plains and valleys. If the battle were deliberately set in array, it would have begun early in the morning, according to the usual practice of these times, when there was not a night-surprise, as when Goliath challenged the Israelites (1 Sam. xvii, 20-23), and when Thothmes III fought the Canaanites at Megiddo; and, as we may judge from the long pursuits at this period, the sun would have been in the eyes of the army of Zerah, and its archers would thus have been useless. The chariots, broken by the charge and with horses made unmanageable by flights of arrows, must have been forced back upon the cumbrous host behind. "So the Lord smote the Ethiopians before Asa, and before Judah; and the Ethiopians fled. And Asa and the people that [were] with him pursued them unto Gerar:

and [or "for"] the Ethiopians were overthrown, that they could not recover themselves." This last clause seems to relate to an irremediable overthrow at the first; and, indeed, had it not been so, the pursuit would not have been carried, and, as it seems, at once, beyond the frontier. So complete was the overthrow that the Hebrews could capture and spoil the cities around Gerar, which must have been in alliance with Zerah. From these cities they took very much spoil, and they also smote "the tents of cattle, and carried away sheep and camels in abundance" (2 Chron. xiv, 9-15). More seems to have been captured from the Arabs than from the army of Zerah: probably the army consisted of a nucleus of regular troops, and a great body of tributaries, who would have scattered in all directions, leaving their country open to reprisals. On his return to Jerusalem, Asa was met by Azariah, who exhorted him and the people to be faithful to God. Accordingly Asa made a second reformation, and collected his subjects at Jerusalem in the third month of the fifteenth year, and made a covenant, and offered of the spoil "seven hundred oxen and seven thousand sheep" (xv, 1-15). From this it would appear that the battle was fought in the preceding winter. The success of Asa, and the manifest blessing that attended him, drew to him Ephraimites, Manassites, and Simeonites. His father had already captured cities in the Israelitish territory (xiii, 19), and he held cities in Mount Ephraim (xv, 8), and then was at peace with Israel. Simeon, always at the mercy of a powerful king of Judah, would have naturally turned to him. Never was the house of David stronger after the defection of the ten tribes; but soon the king fell into the wicked error, so constantly to be repeated, of calling the heathen to aid him against the kindred Israelites, and hired Ben-hadad, king of Syria-Damascus, to lay their cities waste, when Hanani the prophet recalled to him the great victory he had achieved when he trusted in God (xvi, 1-9). The after-years of Asa were troubled with wars (ver. 9); but they were with Baasha (1 Kings xv, 16, 32). Zerah and his people had been too signally crushed to attack him again. See Asa.

4. The identification of Zerah has occasioned some difference of opinion. The term Cushite or Ethiopian may imply that he was of Arabian Cush; the principal objection to which is that history affords no indication that Arabia had at that epoch, or from its system of government could well have, any king so powerful as Zerah. That he was of Abyssinia or African Ethiopia, is resisted by the difficulty of seeing how this "huge host" could have obtained a passage through Egypt, as it must have done to reach Judæa. If we could suppose, with Champollion (Précis, p. 257), whom Coquerel follows (Bog. Sacr. s. v.), that Zerah the Cushite was the then king of Egypt, of an Ethiopian dynasty, this difficulty would be satisfactorily met. But lately it has been supposed that Zerah is the Hebrew name of Usarken I, second king of the Egyptian twenty-second dynasty; or perhaps more probably Usarken II, his second successor. This is a tempting explanation, but cannot be received without question, and it is not deemed satisfactory by Rosellini, Wilkinson, Sharpe, and others. Jahn hazards an ingenious conjecture, that Zerah was king of Cush on both sides of the Red Sea, that is, of both the Arabian and African Ethiopia; and thus provides him a sufficient power without subjecting him to the necessity of passing through Egypt. There are two other suppositions which are not destitute of probability. It is conceived either that he was a native Ethiopian general who, on this occasion, commanded the armies of Egypt, or that he was an Ethiopian general who led an Ethiopian army through Egypt, now separate from Ethiopia, and invaded Judah through Egypt. This question is a wider one than seems at first sight. We have to inquire whether the army of Zerah was that of an Egyptian king, and, if the reply be affirmative, whether it was led by either Usarken I or II.

The war of Shishak had reduced the angle of Arabia that divided Egypt from Palestine. Probably Shishak was unable to attack the Assyrians, and endeavored, by securing this tract, to guard the approach to Egypt. If the army of Zerah were Egyptian, this would account for its connection with the people of Gerar and the pastoral tribes of the neighborhood. The sudden decline of the power of Egypt after the reign of Shishak would be explained by the overthrow of the Egyptian army about thirty years later.

The composition of the army of Zerah, of Cushim and Lubim (2 Chron. xvi, 8), closely resembles that of Shishak, of Lubim, Sukkim, and Cushim (xii, 3): both armies also had chariots and horsemen (xii, 3; xvi, 8). The Cushim might have been of an Asiatic Cush, but the Lubim can only have been Africans. The army, therefore, must have been of a king of Egypt, or Ethiopia above Egypt. The uncertainty is removed by our finding that the kings of the twenty-second dynasty employed mercenaries of the Mashuwasha, a Libyan tribe, which apparently supplied the most important part of their hired force. The army, moreover, as consisting partly, if not wholly, of a mercenary force, and with chariots and horsemen, is, save in the horsemen, exactly what the Egyptian army of the empire would have been, with the one change of the increased importance given to the mercenaries, which we know marked it under the twenty-second dynasty. That the army was that of an Egyptian king therefore cannot be doubted.

As to the identification of Zerah with a Usarken, we speak diffidently. That he is called a Cushite must be compared with the occurrence of the name Namuret, Nimrod, in the line of the Usarkens, but that line seems rather to have been of Eastern than of Western Ethiopians. The name Usarken has been thought to be Sargon, in which case it is unlikely, but not impossible, that another Hebrew or Semic name should have been adopted to represent the Egyptian form. On the other hand, the kings of the twenty-second dynasty were of a warlike family, and their sons constantly held military commands. It is unlikely that an important army would have been intrusted to any but a king or prince. Usarken is less remote from Zerah than seems at first sight, and, according to our computation, Zerah might have been Usarken II, but according to Dr. Hincks's, Usarken I.

5. Preternatural Character of the Deliverance.—The defeat of the Egyptian army by Asa is without parallel in the history of the Jews. On no other occasion did an Israelitish army meet an army of one of the great powers on either side and defeat it. Shishak was unopposed; Sennacherib was not met in the field; Necho was so met, and overthrew Josiah's army; Nebuchadnezzar, like Shishak, was only delayed by fortifications. The defeat of Zerah thus is a solitary instance, more of the power of faith than of the bravery of the Hebrews, a single witness that the God of Israel was still the same who had led his people through the Red Sea, and would give them the same aid if they trusted in him. We have, indeed, no distinct statement that the defeat of Zerah was a miracle, but we have proof enough that God providentially enabled the Hebrews to vanquish a force greater in number, stronger in the appliances of war, with horsemen and chariots, more accurate in discipline, no raw levies hastily equipped from the king's armory, but a seasoned standing militia, strengthened and more terrible by the addition of swarms of hungry Arabs, bred to war, and whose whole life was a time of pillage. This great deliverance is one of the many proofs that God is to his people ever the same, whether he bids them stand still and behold his salvation, or nerves them with that courage that has wrought great things in his name in our later age; thus it bridges over a chasm between two periods outwardly unlike, and bids us see in history the immutability of the divine actions. See EGYPT.

Zerahi'ah (Heb. Zerachyah', זֶרַחְיָה, Jehovah has risen; Sept. Ζαχαΐα v. r. Ζαπαΐα), the name of two Hebrews.

1. A priest, son of Uzzi and father of Meraioth, in the ancestry of the later Jewish pontiffs (1 Chron. vi, 6, 51 [Heb. v, 32; vi, 30]), and of Ezra (Ezra vii, 4). B.C. cir. 1350. See HIGH-PRIEST.

2. Father of Elihoenai "of the sons of Pahath-moab" (Ezra viii, 4). B.C. ante 459.

Zera'im. See TALMUD.

Ze'red (Heb. id. זֶרֶד [in pause Za'red, זֶרֶד, Deut. ii, 13; "Zared," Numb. xxi, 12], osier-brook; Sept. Ζαρῑδ v. r. Ζαρίρ and Ζαρί, the name of a brook or valley (זֶרֶד) on the border between Moab and Edom (Deut. ii, 13), where the Israelites encamped before crossing the Arnon (Numb. xxi, 12). It seems to be the same with the Wady el-Ahsy, which runs into the Dead Sea near its S.E. corner (Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii, 157). Laborde, arguing from the distance, thinks that the source of the Wady Ghüründel in the Arabah is the site, as from Mount Hor to el-Ahsy is by way of Ezion-geber sixty-five leagues, in which only four stages occur—a rate of progress quite beyond their power. This argument, however, is feeble, since it is clear that the march-stations mentioned indicate not daily stages, but more permanent encampments. He also thinks the palm-trees of Wady Ghüründel would have attracted notice, and that Wady Jethum (el-Ithm) could not have been the way consistently with the precept of Deut. ii, 3. The camping station in the catalogue of Numb. xxiii, which corresponds to the "pitching in the valley of Ze-red" of xxi, 12, is probably Dibon-gad, as it stands next to Ije-abarim (comp. xxxiii, 44, 45 with xxi, 12). The Wady el-Ahsy forms the boundary between the districts of Jebal and Kerak. Taking its rise near the castle of el-Ahsy, on the route of the Syrian Haj, upon the high eastern desert, it breaks down through the whole chain of mountains (Burckhardt, Travels, p. 400) in a very deep ravine, and contains a hot spring which the Arabs call the "Bath of Solomon son of David" (Irby, May 29). The Israelites doubtless crossed it near its upper end, where it would present no difficulty. See EX-ODE.

The Jewish interpreters translate the name in the first case "osiers," and in the second "baskets" (Targum of Pseudo-Jonathan), which recalls the "brook of the willows" of Isaiah (xv, 7). The name Sufsaf (willow) is attached to the valley which runs down from Kerak to the Dead Sea; but this appears to be too far north for the Zered. See WILLOWS, BROOK OF THE.

Zer'eda (Heb. with the art. hats-Tseredah', הַצֶּרֶדָה, the fortress [Fürst] or the cool [Gesen.]; Sept. ἡ Σαριδᾶ v. r. Σαριᾶ; Vulg. Sareda), a town in Mount Ephraim, the birthplace of Jeroboam the son of Nebat (1 Kings xi, 26). In an addition made by the Sept. to ch. xii, Sarira (as this place is called by some MSS.) is said to have been built by Jeroboam for Solomon, and it is stated that to it Jeroboam returned when he came out of Egypt. The same passage further substitutes it for Tirzah. It seems to have been located as a fastness on some strong position. On this account, as well as because of its connection with Mount Ephraim, it cannot be (as many think) the same with Zeredatha, Zerrath, or Zarthan, which lay in the Jordan valley. Lieut. Conder (Tent Work in Palest. ii, 340) identifies it with Surdah, a village little more than a mile south of Jufna (Tristram, Bible Places, p. 110).

Zered'athah (Heb. Tseredu'thah, צֶרֶד־אֶתָּה, which is the same word with Zereda above, with א local added; Sept. Σαρεδά v. r. Σαρηδά and Σαδαδά; Vulg. Saredathus), mentioned as the place of Solomon's brass-foundry (2 Chron. iv, 17), in place of the ZARTHAN (q. v.) of the parallel passage (1 Kings vii, 46).

Zer'erath [some Zere'rath], or rather ZER'ERATH (Heb. Tsererah', צֶרֶרֶת, with א local added, Tserera'thah, צֶרֶרֶתָּה, to Zererah, perh. an interchange for Zeredah, as some MSS. and versions read; Sept. Ταραρά v. r. καὶ συνηγμένη; Vulg. omits), a place mentioned (Judg. vii, 22) in describing the rout of the Midianites before Gideon: "And the host [camp] fled to [as far as] Beth-shittah in [towards] Zererah [Zererah], and [i. e. even] to [as far as] the border of Abel-meholah, unto [upon] Tabbath." It appears to have been the same place in the Jordan valley elsewhere called Zeredathah (q. v.) or Zaretan (q. v.), but not Zereda (q. v.).

Zer'esh (Heb. id. זֶרֶשׁ, Persian for gold; Sept. Ζωραπά v. r. Ζωσαπά; Josephus, Ζάπαπα, Ant. xi, 6, 10; Vulg. Zares), the wife of Haman the Agagite (Esth. v, 10), who advised him to prepare the gallows for Mordecai (ver. 14), but predicted his fall on learning that Mordecai was a Jew (vi, 13). B.C. 474. See ESTHER.

Zereth. See SPAN.

Zer'eth (Heb. Tse'reth, צֶרֶת, prob. splendor; Sept. Σερῑθ v. r. Σαρίθ and Ἀρίθ; Vulg. Sereth), first named of the three sons of Ashur (the Judahite and founder of Tekoa) by one of his wives, Helah (1 Chron. iv, 7). B.C. cir. 1612.

Zer'ri (Heb. Tseri', צֶרִי; Sept. Σορί; Vulg. Sori), second named of the six sons and assistants of Jeduthun in the Levitical music (1 Chron. xxv, 8); probably the same elsewhere (ver. 11) called by the equivalent name of IZRI (q. v.).

Zer'ror (Heb. Tseror', צֶרֶר, a bunch, as often; Sept. Σαρόρ v. r. Ἀρίδ and Ἰαρίδ; Vulg. Seror), a Benjamite, son of Bechorath and father of Abiel in the ancestry of king Saul (1 Sam. ix, 1). B.C. cir. 1230.

Zeru'ah (Heb. Tseruah', צֶרֶוּחַ, smitten with leprosy [Gesen.] or full-breasted [Fürst]; Sept. Σαρούα; Vulg. Sarua), the widowed mother of Jeroboam the son of Nebat (1 Kings xi, 26). B.C. 973. In the additional narrative of the Sept. inserted after 1 Kings xii, 24, she is called Sarira (a corruption of Zereda, Jeroboam's native place), and is said to have been a harlot.

Zerub'babel (Heb. Zerubbabel', זֶרֻבָבֶל, sown in Babylon; Sept. Ζοροβάβελ; Josephus, Ζοροβάβελος), the phylarch or head of the tribe of Judah at the time of the return from the Babylonian captivity in the first year of Cyrus. B.C. 536. His exact parentage is a little obscure from his being always called the son of Shealtiel (Ezra iii, 2, 8; v, 2, etc.; Hag. i, 1, 12, 14, etc.), and appearing as such in the genealogies ("Zorobabel," Matt. i, 12; Luke iii, 27), whereas in 1 Chron. iii, 19 he is represented as the son of Pedaiah, Shealtiel's or Salathiel's brother, and consequently as Salathiel's nephew. Probably the genealogy in 1 Chron. exhibits his legal parentage, and he succeeded his uncle as head of the house of Judah—a supposition which tallies with the facts that Salathiel appears as the first-born, and that no children are assigned to him. It is worth noting that Josephus speaks of Zorobabel as "the son of Salathiel of the posterity of David and of the tribe of Judah" (Ant. xi, 3, 10). Had he believed him to be the son of Jeconiah, of whom he had spoken (x, 11, 2), he could hardly have failed to say so (comp. x, 7, 1). (See below.)

1. Canonical History.—In the first year of Cyrus, Zerubbabel was living at Babylon, and was the recognised prince (נָשִׂיא) of Judah in the Captivity, what in later times was called הַנְּלִיָּהוּ, or "the Prince of the Captivity." On the issuing of Cyrus's decree, he immediately availed himself of it, and placed himself at the head of those of his countrymen "whose spirit God had raised to go up to build the house of the Lord which is in Jerusalem." It is probable that he was in the king of Babylon's service, both from his having, like Daniel and the three children, received a Chaldean name (Sheesh-bazzar), and from his receiving from Cyrus the office of governor (חַגְגַּי) of Judæa. The restoration of the sacred vessels which Nebuchadnezzar had brought from the Temple having been effected, and copious presents of silver and gold and goods and beasts having been bestowed upon the captives, Zerubbabel went forth at the head of the returning colony, accompanied by Jeshua the high-priest, and perhaps by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, and a considerable number of priests, Levites, and heads of houses of Judah and Benjamin, with their followers. On arriving at Jerusalem, Zerubbabel's first care was to build the altar on its old site, and to restore the daily sacrifice. Perhaps, also, they kept the Feast of Tabernacles, as it is said they did in Ezra iii, 4. But his great work, which he set about immediately, was the rebuilding of the Temple. Being armed with a grant from Cyrus of timber and stone for the building, and of money for the expenses of the builders (Ezra vi, 4), he had collected the materials, including cedar-trees brought from Lebanon to Joppa, according to the precedent in the time of Solomon (2 Chron. ii, 16), and got together masons and carpenters to do the work by the opening of the second year of their return to Jerusalem. Accordingly, in the second month of the second year of their return, the foundation of the Temple was laid with all the pomp which they could command: the priests in their vestments with trumpets, and the sons of Asaph with cymbals, singing the very same psalm of praise for God's un-failing mercy to Israel which was sung when Solomon dedicated his Temple (v, 11-14); while the people responded with a great shout of joy "because the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid." How strange must have been the emotions of Zerubbabel at this moment! As he stood upon Mount Zion and beheld from its summit the desolations of Jerusalem, the site of the Temple blank, David's palace a heap of ashes, his father's sepulchres defiled and overlaid with rubbish, and the silence of desertion and emptiness hanging oppressively over the streets and waste places of what was once the joyous city; and then remembered how his great ancestor David had brought up the ark in triumph to the very spot where he was then standing, how Solomon had reigned there in all his magnificence and power, and how the petty kings and potentates of the neighboring nations had been his vassals and tributaries—how must his heart alternately have swelled with pride, and throbbed with anguish, and sunk in humiliation! In the midst of these mighty memories he was but the officer of a foreign beathen despot, the head of a feeble remnant of half-emancipated slaves, the captain of a band hardly able to hold up their heads in the presence of their hostile and jealous neighbors; and yet there he was, the son of David, the heir of great and mysterious promises, returned by a wonderful providence to the home of his ancestors. At his bidding the daily sacrifice had been restored after a cessation of half a century, and now the foundations of the Temple were actually laid, amid the songs of the Levites singing according to David's ordinance, and the shouts of the tribe of Judah. It was a heart-stirring situation; and, despite all the discouragements attending it, we cannot doubt that Zerubbabel's faith and hope were kindled by it into fresh life.

But there were many hindrances and delays to be encountered before the work was finished. The Samaritans or Cutheans put in a claim to join with the Jews in rebuilding the Temple; and when Zerubbabel and his companions refused to admit them into partnership, they tried to hinder them from building, and hired counsellors to frustrate their purpose. They probably contrived, in the first instance, to intercept the supplies of timber and stone, and the wages of the workmen, which were paid out of the king's revenue, and then by misrepresentation to calumniate them at the court of Persia. Thus they were successful in putting a stop to the work during the seven remaining years of the reign of Cyrus, and through the eight years of Cambyses and Smerdis. Nor does Zerubbabel appear quite blameless for this long delay. The difficulties in the way of building the Temple were not such as need have stopped the work; and during this long suspension of sixteen years, Zerubbabel and the rest of the people had been busy in building costly houses for themselves, and one might even suspect that the cedar-wood which had been brought for the Temple had been used to decorate private dwellings (comp. the use of יָבֹק in Hagg. i, 4, and 1 Kings vii, 3, 7). They had, in fact, ceased to care for the desolation of the Temple (Hagg. i, 2-4), and had not noticed that God was rebuking their lukewarmness by withholding his blessing from their labors (ver. 5-11). But in the second year of Darius light dawned upon the darkness of the colony from Babylon. In that year—it was the most memorable event in Zerubbabel's life—the spirit of prophecy suddenly blazed up with a most brilliant light among the returned captives; and the long silence which was to ensue till the ministry of John the Baptist was preceded by the stirring utterances of Haggai and Zechariah. Their words fell like sparks upon tinder. In a moment Zerubbabel, roused from his apathy, threw his whole strength into the work, zealously seconded by Jeshua and all the people. Undeterred by a fresh attempt of their enemies to hinder the progress of the building, they went on with the work even while a reference was made to Darius; and when, after the original decree of Cyrus had been found at Ecbatana, a most gracious and favorable decree was issued by Darius, enjoining Tatnai and Shetharboznai to assist the Jews with whatsoever they had need of at the king's expense, the work advanced so rapidly that on the third day of the month Adar, in the sixth year of Darius, the Temple was finished, and was forthwith dedicated with much pomp and rejoicing. It is difficult to calculate how great was the effect of the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah in sustaining the courage and energy of Zerubbabel in carrying his work to completion. Addressed, as many of them were, directly to Zerubbabel by name; speaking, as they did, most glorious things of the Temple which he was building; conveying to Zerubbabel himself extraordinary assurances of divine favor, and coupling with them magnificent and consolatory predictions of the future glory of Jerusalem and Judah and of the conversion of the Gentiles, they necessarily exercised an immense influence upon his mind (Hagg. i, 13, 14; ii, 4-9, 21-23; Zech. iv, 6-10; viii, 3-8, 9, 18-23). It is not too much to say that these prophecies upon Zerubbabel were the immediate instrument by which the Church and commonwealth of Judah were preserved from destruction and received a life which endured till the coming of Christ.

The only other works of Zerubbabel which we learn from the Scripture history are the restoration of the courses of priests and Levites, and of the provision for their maintenance, according to the institution of David (Ezra vi, 18; Neh. xii, 47); the registering of the returned captives according to their genealogies (vii, 5); and the keeping of a Passover in the seventh year of Darius, with which last event ends all that we know of the life of Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel—a man inferior to few of the great characters of Scripture, whether we consider the perilous undertaking to which he devoted himself, the importance in the economy of the divine government of his work, his courageous faith, or the singular distinction of being the object of so many and such remarkable prophetic utterances.

2. The Apocryphal history of Zerubbabel, which, as usual, Josephus follows, may be summed up in a few words. The story told in 1 Esdr. iii-vii is that on the occasion of a great feast made by Darius on his accession, three young men of his body-guard had a contest who should write the wisest sentence. One of the three (Zerubbabel) writing "Women are strongest, but above all things Truth beareth away the victory," and afterwards defending his sentence with much eloquence, was declared by acclamation to be the wisest, and claimed for his reward at the king's hand that the king should perform his vow which he had vowed to rebuild Jerusalem and the Temple. Upon this the king gave him letters to all his treasurers and governors on the other side the river, with grants of money and exemption from taxes, and sent him to rebuild Jerusalem and the Temple, accompanied by the families of which the list is given in Ezra ii, Neh. vii; and then follows, in utter confusion, the history of Zerubbabel as given in Scripture. Apparently, too, the compiler did not perceive that Sanabasar (Sheshbazzar) was the same person as Zerubbabel. Josephus, indeed, seems to identify Sheshbazzar with Zerubbabel, and tries to reconcile the story in 1 Esdras by saying, "Now it so fell out that about this time Zorobabel, who had been made governor of the Jews that had been in captivity, came to Darius from Jerusalem, for there had been an old friendship between him and the king," etc. (Ant. xi, 8). But it is obvious on the face of it that this is simply Josephus's invention to reconcile 1 Esdr. with the canonical Ezra. Josephus has also another story (ibid. xi, 4, 9) which is not found in 1 Esdras, of Zorobabel going on an embassy to Darius to accuse the Samaritan governors and hipparchs of withholding from the Jews the grants made by Darius out of the royal treasury for the offering of sacrifices and other Temple expenses, and of his obtaining a decree from the king commanding his officers in Samaria to supply the high-priest with all that he required. But that this is not authentic history seems pretty certain from the names of the governors, Sambabas being an imitation or corruption of Sanballat, Tangenes of Tatnai (or Thaathanai, as in Sept.), Sadraces of Sathrabouzan, confused with Shadrach, Bobelo of Zorobabel; and the names of the ambassadors, which are manifestly copied from the list in 1 Esdr. v, 8, where Zorobabel, Enenius, and Mardocheus correspond to Zorobabel, Ananias, and Mardocheus of Josephus. Moreover, the letter or decree of Darius as given by Josephus is as manifestly copied from the decree of Darius in Ezra vi, 6-10. In all probability, therefore, the document used by Josephus was one of those numerous Apocryphal religious romances of which the Hellenistic Jews were so fond about the 4th and 3d century before Christ, and was written partly to explain Zorobabel's presence at the court of Darius, as spoken of in 1 Esdras, partly to explain that of Mordecai at the court of Ahasuerus, though he was in the list of those who were Zorobabel's companions (as it seemed), and partly to give an opportunity for reviling and humiliating the Samaritans. It also gratified the favorite taste for embellishing and corroborating, and giving, as was thought, additional probability to, the Scripture narrative, and dwelling upon bygone times of Jewish triumphs.

3. The list of Zerubbabel's posterity in 1 Chron. iii, 19-24 is somewhat confused. Perhaps its statements may be harmonized with themselves and with the New-Test. genealogies, if the entire passage read thus: [ver. 19] "The issue of Pedaiab were Zerubbabel (by his brother Salathiel's widow), Shimei (to whom may be added Zerubbabel's children, Meshullam, Hananiah, and a daughter Shelomith), [ver. 20] Hashubah, Ohel, Berechiah, and Hasadiah (called also Jushab-hesed), making in all five sons (besides Zerubbabel, who was reckoned as Salathiel's heir [Ezra iii, 2]). [Ver. 21] The descendants of the above Hananiah were Pelatiah and Jessaiab, besides the children of a third son Rephaiah, together with those of Arnan (one of the last-mentioned children), and in like manner the issue again of his son Obadiah and grandson Shechaniah. [Ver. 22] The family of this last consisted of six descendants, namely, his son Shemaiah, and grandchildren Hattush, Igeal, Bariah, Neariah, and Shaphat. [Ver. 23] Neariah had three sons, Elioenai, Hezekiah, and Azrikum; [ver. 24] and Elioenai again seven, namely, Hodaiah, Elia-shib, Pelaiah, Akkub, Johanan, Delaiah, and Anani." An objection, it must be admitted, lies against this arrangement, namely, that it brings down the list to a later date than the close of the Old-Test. canon (B.C. 406), requiring the supposition of the addition of some of the last names by a subsequent hand. Another view, which condenses the lineage within earlier limits, is given under DARIUS 2. The above adjustment, however, is not only conformed to the natural view of the text, but is also confirmed by not a few striking coincidences in names and descent with the genealogies of our Lord as given by the evangelists. The following table will exhibit these at a glance (see Strong, Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels, § 9). See GENEALOGY OF CHRIST.

Zeru'iah (Heb. Tseruyah, צְרוּיָה [1 Sam. xiv, 1 צְרוּיָה], wounded [Gesen.] or balsam [Fürst]; Sept. and Josephus, Σαρπία; Vulg. Sarvia), a woman noted as the mother of the three leading heroes of David's army—Abishai, Joab, and Asahel—the "sons of Zeruiah" (1 Sam. xxvi, 6; 2 Sam. ii, 18; 1 Kings i, 7, etc.). B.C. ante 1046. She and Abigail are specified in the genealogy of David's family in 1 Chron. ii, 13-17 as "sisters of the sons of Jesse" (ver. 16; comp. Josephus, Ant. vi, 10, 1). The expression is in itself enough to raise a suspicion that she was not a daughter of Jesse, a suspicion which is corroborated by the statement of 2 Sam. xvii, 25, that Abigail was the daughter of Nahash. Abigail being apparently the younger of the two women, it is a probable inference that they were both the daughters of Nahash, but whether this Nahash be—as Prof. Stanley has ingeniously conjectured—the king of the Ammonites, and the former husband of Jesse's wife, or some other person unknown, must forever remain a mere conjecture. See DAVID; NAHASH. Her relation to Jesse (in the original Ishai) is expressed in the name of her son Abishai. Of Zeruiah's husband there is no mention in the Bible. Josephus (Ant. vii, 1, 3) explicitly states that his name was Souri (Σοῦρι), but no corroboration of the statement appears to have been discovered in the Jewish traditions, nor does Josephus himself refer to it again. The mother of such remarkable sons must herself have been a remarkable woman, and this may account for the fact, unusual if not unique, that the family is always called after her, and that her husband's name has not been considered worthy of preservation in the sacred records.

Ze'tham (Heb. Zetham', זֶתָם, prob. i. q. Zethan [q. v.]; Sept. Ζεθόμ v. r. Ζεθόμ, Ζηθάν, etc.; Vulg. Zetham, Zetham), a grandson of Laadan, a Gershonite Levite (1 Chron. xxiii, 8), associated with his father, Jehiel or Jehieli, and his brother Joel, in charge of the Temple treasury (xxvi, 22). B.C. 1043.

Ze'than (Heb. Zeythan', זֵיתָן, olive [Gesén.] or shining [Fürst]; Sept. Ζαιθάν v. r. Ζηθάν; Vulg. Zethan), fifth named of the seven sons of Bilhan, a Benjamite (1 Chron. vii, 10). B.C. prob. 1014.

Ze'thar (Heb. Zethar', זֶתָר, prob. Persian, either star [Gesén.] or sacrifice [Fürst]; Sept. Ἀβαραζάξ; Vulg. Zethar), sixth named of the seven eunuchs of Ahasuerus who attended upon the king, and were commanded to bring Vashti into his presence (Esth. i, 10). B.C. 483.

Zi'a (Heb. id. זִי, motion [Gesén.] or terrified [Fürst]; Sept. Ζιά v. r. Ζοβί; Vulg. Zie), sixth named of the seven Gadite chiefs resident in Bashan (1 Chron. v, 18). B.C. prob. 1014.

Zi'ba (Heb. Tsiba', צִיבָא, [briefly צִבָּא, 2 Sam. xvi, 4], plantation [Fürst], or statue [Gesén.]; Sept. Σιβά v. r. Σιββά; Josephus, Σιβάξ; Vulg. Siba), a person who plays a prominent part, though with doubtful credit to himself, in one of the episodes of David's history (2 Sam. ix, 2-12; xvi, 1-4; xix, 17, 29). He had been a slave (עֶבֶר) of the house of Saul before the overthrow of his kingdom, and (probably at the time of the great Philistine incursion which proved so fatal to his master's family) had been set free (Josephus, Ant. vii, 5, 5). It was of him that David inquired if there was any one left of the house of Saul to whom the monarch might show favor. B.C. 1044. Mephibosheth was in consequence found, and having been certified of David's friendship, Ziba was appointed to till the land for the prince, and generally to constitute his household and do him service (2 Sam. ix, 2-10). The opportunities thus afforded him he had so far improved that when first encountered in the history he is head of an establishment of fifteen sons and twenty slaves. David's reception of Mephibosheth had the effect of throwing Ziba with his whole establishment back into the state of bondage from which he had so long been free. It reduced him from being an independent landholder to the position of a mere dependent. When David had to fly from Jerusalem in consequence of the rebellion of Absalom, Ziba met the king with a large and acceptable present: "But where is Mephibosheth?" asked the fugitive monarch. "In Jerusalem," was the answer; "for he said, 'To-day shall the house of Israel restore me the kingdom of my father.'" Enraged at this, which looked like ingratitude as well as treachery, David thereupon gave to Ziba all the property of Mephibosheth (xvi, 1 sq.). On David's return to his metropolis an explanation took place, when Mephibosheth accused Ziba of having slandered him; and David, apparently not being perfectly satisfied with the defence, gave his final award, that the land should be divided between the master and his servant (xix, 24 sq.). B.C. 1023. See MEPIBOSHETH.

Zib'eon (Heb. Tsibon', צִיבְיֹן, dyed [Gesén.] or robber [Fürst]; Sept. Σεβγών; Vulg. Sebeon), the father of Anah, whose daughter Aholibamah was Esau's wife (Gen. xxxvi, 2). B.C. ante 1963. Although called a Hivite, he is probably the same as Zibeon the son of Seir the Horite (ver. 20, 24, 29; 1 Chron. i, 38, 40), the latter signifying "cave-dweller" and the former being the name of his tribe, for we know nothing of the race of the Troglodytes; or perhaps הִוִּי (the Hivite) is a mistranscription for הֹרִי (the Horite). See ESAU.

Another difficulty connected with this Zibeon is that Anah in Gen. xxxvi, 2 is called his daughter, and in ver. 24 his son; but this difficulty appears to be easily explained by supposing that בִּר refers to Aholibamah, and not to the name next preceding it. The Samaritan, it should be observed, has בִּר. An allusion is made to some unrecorded fact in the history of the Horites in the passage "This [was that] Anah that found the mules in the wilderness as he fed the asses of Zibeon his father" (ver. 24). The word rendered "mules" (q. v.) in the A. V. is the Heb. יָמִים, yemim, perhaps the Emim, or giants, as in the reading of the Sam. יָמִים, and so also Onkelos and Pseudo-Jonathan; Gesenius prefers "hot-springs," following the Vulg. rendering. Zibeon was also one of the dukes or phylarchs of the Horites (ver. 29). For the identification with Beer, father of Judith the Hittite (xxvi, 34), see BEERI, and also ANAH.

Zib'ia (Heb. Tsibya', צִיבְיָא, roe; Sept. Σεβιά v. r. Ἰεβιά; Vulg. Sebia), a Benjamite, second named of the seven sons of Shaharaim (q. v.) by one of his two wives, Hodesh (1 Chron. viii, 9). B.C. post 1612.

Zib'iah (Heb. Tsibyah', צִיבְיָה, roe; Sept. Σεβιά v. r. Ἀβιά; Vulg. Sebia), a native of Beer-sheba, mother of king Jehoash of Judah (2 Kings xii, 1; 2 Chron. xxiv, 1), and consequently wife (or concubine) of his father, Ahaziah. B.C. 876.

Zich'ri (Heb. Zikri', זִכְרִי, my memorial or memorable; Sept. Ζεξι v. r. Ζαξι, Ζοξι, Ζαπι, and even sometimes Ζαχαρία, Ezexi; Vulg. Zechri), the name of numerous Hebrews.

1. Last named of the three sons of Izhar the son of Kohath of the tribe of Levi (Exod. vi, 21, where most editions of the A. V. incorrectly have "Zithri"). B.C. cir. 1658.

2. Second named of the nine sons of Shimhi of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 19). B.C. cir. 1612.

3. Fifth named of the eleven sons of Shashak of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 23). B.C. cir. 1612.

4. Last named of the six sons of Jeroham of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 27). B.C. cir. 1612.

5. A "son" of Asaph and father of Micah (1 Chron. ix, 15); elsewhere called Zabdi (Neh. xi, 17) and Zacur (xii, 35).

6. A descendant of Eliezer the son of Moses, being son of Joram and father of the treasurer Shelomith (1 Chron. xxvi, 25). B.C. ante 1043.

7. The father of Eliezer, which latter was chief of the Reubenites in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvii, 16). B.C. ante 1043.

8. A Judahite whose son Amasiah volunteered at the head of 200,000 men in Jehoshaphat's army (2 Chron. xvii, 16). B.C. 909.

9. Father of Elishaphat, which latter was one of the conspirators with Jehoiada to restore Joash (2 Chron. xxiii, 1). B.C. ante 876.

10. An Ephraimitish chief in the invading army of Pekah the son of Remaliah (2 Chron. xxviii, 7). B.C. cir. 734. It seems that he took advantage of the victory of this monarch over the army of Judah to penetrate into Jerusalem, where he slew one of the sons of Ahaz, the governor of the palace, and the king's chief minister or favorite. See AHAZ; PEKAH. There is some probability in the conjecture that he was the "Tabael's son" whom Pekah and Rezin designed to set upon the throne of Judah (Isa. vii, 6). See TABAEL.

11. Father of Joel, which latter was superintendent of the Benjamites after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi, 9). B.C. ante 536.

12. A priest of the family of Abijah in the days of the high-priest Joiakim the son of Jeshua (Neh. xii, 17). B.C. cir. 480.

Zid'dim (Heb. with the art. hats-Tsiddim', הַצִּדִּים, the declivities; Sept. τῶν Τυπίων [apparently reading γ for ז]; Vulg. Assedim), the first named of the fortified towns of the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. xix, 35), Zer being mentioned next; but the two names are probably to be connected as one. See ZER. The Sept. (as above) identifies the place with Tyre and the Syriac with Zidon, but both these are quite beyond the bounds of Naphtali. The Jerusalem Talmud (Megillah, ch. i) is probably nearer the mark in identifying hats-Tsiddim with Kefr Chittai, which Schwarz (Palest. p. 182) with much probability takes to be the present Hattin, at the northern foot of the well-known Kurn Hattin, or "Horns of Hattin," a few miles west of Tiberias. This identification falls in with the fact that the next names in the list are all known to have been connected with the lake. "The village has several traces of antiquity in its tombs, and is, compared with many others, a clean and thriving place" (Tristram, Bible Places, p. 258).

Zidki'jah (Neh. x, 1). See ZEDEKIAH.

Zi'don (Heb. Tsidon', צִידוֹן [or briefer צִידֹן], Gen. x, 15, 19; xlix, 13, fishery [Gesen.] or fortress [Furst]; Sept. [usually]. New Test., and classical writers generally, Σιδών; A. V. "Sidon" in ver. 15, 19, and New Test.), the name of a man and of a place. They have a mutual bearing in relation to origin and birthplace of the Punic race which figured so conspicuously in later times and in Roman history.

1. The eldest son of Canaan (Gen. x, 15; 1 Chron. i, 13). B.C. considerably post 2514. See ETHNOGRAPHY.

2. One of the most ancient cities of Phœnicia (Gen. x, 19; xlix, 13; Josh. xi, 8; xix, 28; Judg. i, 31; x, 6; xviii, 28; 2 Sam. xxiv, 6; 1 Kings xvii, 9; Isa. xxiii, 2, 4, 12; Jer. xxv, 22; xxvii, 3; xlvii, 4; Ezek. xxvii, 8; xxviii, 21, 22; Joel ii, 4 [Heb. iv, 4]; Zech. ix, 2; Matt. xi, 21, 22; xv, 21; Mark iii, 8; vii, 24, 31; Luke iv, 26; vi, 17; x, 13, 14; Acts xii, 20, xxvii, 3), which still retains its ancient appellation (Phœn. צִידֹן) in the Arabic form Saida. Justin Martyr (who lived in Palestine) derives the name from the Phœnician word fish, "piscem Phœnices sidon vocant" (xviii, 3); but Josephus, from the son of Canaan (Ant. vi, 2).

1. Situation and Importance.—Zidon lies on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea, in lat. 33° 34' 5''

N., less than twenty English miles to the north of Tyre. It is situated in the narrow plain between the Lebanon and the sea, to which it once gave its own name (Josephus, Ant. v, 3, 1, τὸ μέγα πῆδιον Σιδῶνος πόλεως) at a point where the mountains recede to a distance of two miles (Kenrick, Phœnicia, p. 19). Adjoining the city there are luxuriant gardens and orchards, in which there is a profusion of the finest fruit trees suited to the climate. "The plain is flat and low," says Mr. Porter, author of the Handbook for Syria and Palestine, "but near the coast line rises a little hill, a spur from which shoots out a few hundred yards into the sea in a south-western direction. On the northern slope of the promontory thus formed stands the old city of Zidon. The hill behind on the south is covered by the citadel" (Encyclop. Britannica, 8th ed. s. v.). It had a very commodious harbor, which is now nearly choked up with sand (Strabo, xvi, 756; Josephus, Ant. xiv, 10, 6). It was distant one day's journey from the fountains of the Jordan (ibid. v, 3, 1), and four hundred stadia from Berytus (Strabo, xvi, 756, 757). It was situated in the allotment of the tribe of Asher, but never conquered (Judg. i, 31); on the contrary, it was sometimes a formidable enemy (x, 12). Even in Joshua's time it was called Tsidon-rabba, or Great Zidon (Josh. xi, 8; xix, 28), or Zidon the Metropolis, scil. of Zidonía. This district appears to have embraced the states of Zidon, Tyre, and Aradas, and its inhabitants are always distinguished from the inhabitants of the city itself (called "dwellers [יְיֻשְׁבֵי] of Zidon") as צִידֹנִיִּים, "Zidonians," or dwellers in the districts; and it seems in those early times to have extended northward to the Gibletes, southward to the Carmel (Zebulun's border, Gen. xlix, 13). At a later period the boundaries south were determined by the fluctuating issue of the struggle for the hegemony between Zidon and Tyre, while northward the river Tamyris divided it from the State of Berytus. To the east, where it never had extended very far (Dan, a Zidonian colony, being described as being "far from the Zidonians," Judg. xviii, 7) in early days, it touched, at a later period, the territory of Damascus. The assumption, however, drawn by some writers from the inexact way in which the appellation Zidonian is used by ancient writers—viz. that this name stood for "Phœnician," and Zidonia itself for the whole of Phœnicia, of which it formed only an important part—is incorrect. Tyre, of later origin than Zidon, if not indeed founded by it, in the same way styles itself on coins זִידוֹן, "Metropolis of Zidonia," in the sense of its momentary hegemony over Zidon only, possibly also with a secondary reference to the nationality of its inhabitants, mostly immigrants from Zidon.

The frequent allusions to the skillfulness of the Zidonians in arts and manufactures, the extent of their commerce, their nautical information and prowess, in ancient writers, are well known (see Homer, Il. vi, 290; xxiii, 743; Odys. iv, 617; xiii, 285; xv, 117, 425). Of the trade of the "Zidonian merchants" (Isa. xxiii, 2; Ezek. xxvii, 8), both by land and sea, we hear in Diod. Sic. (xvi, 41, 45); of their glass, linen, and other manufactures, in Pliny (v, 20), Virgil, Strabo (xvi, 10), and other classical writers. The best vessels in the fleet of Xerxes were Zidonian (Herod. vii, 99, 128). In Hasselquist's time (1750) its exports to France were considerable (Travels, p. 166); but at present its traffic is chiefly confined to the neighboring towns (Mannert, Geographie, i, 291; Kitto, Pictorial Bible, notes on Deut. xxxiii and Josh. xix).

2. History.—The antiquity of Zidon is evident from the ethnological assertion that Zidon was the first-born of Canaan, though Berytus and Byblus, as towns founded by Cronos, claimed a high mythological antiquity. Tyre is not mentioned in the Pentateuch at all; but Zidon is referred to in terms that give it the pre-eminence among Phœnician cities. From a Biblical point of view, this city is inferior in interest to its neighbor Tyre, with which its name is so often associated. Indeed, in all the passages above referred to in which the two cities are mentioned together, Tyre is named first—a circumstance which might at once be deemed accidental, or the mere result of Tyre's being the nearest of the two cities to Palestine, were it not that some doubt on this point is raised by the order being reversed in two works which were written at a period after Zidon had enjoyed a long temporary superiority (Ezra iii, 7; 1 Chron. xxii, 4). However this may be, it is certain that, of the two, Tyre is of the greater importance in reference to the writings of the most celebrated Hebrew prophets; and the splendid prophecies directed against Tyre, as a single colossal power (Ezek. xxvi; xxvii; xxviii, 1-19; Isa. xxiii), have no parallel in the shorter and vaguer utterances against Zidon (Ezek. xxviii, 21-23). The predominant Biblical interest of Tyre arises from the prophecies relating to its destiny.

If we could believe Justin (xviii, 3), there would be no doubt that Zidon was of greater antiquity than Tyre, as he says that the inhabitants of Zidon, when their city had been reduced by the king of Ashkelon, founded Tyre the year before the capture of Troy. Justin, however, is such a weak authority for any disputed historical fact, and his account of the early history of the Jews, wherein we have some means of testing his accuracy, seems to be so much in the nature of a romance (xxvi, 2), that, without laying stress on the unreasonableness of any one's assuming to know the precise time when Troy was taken, he cannot be accepted as an authority for the early history of the Phœnicians. In contradiction of this statement, it has been further insisted on that the relation between a colony and the mother city among the Phœnicians was sacred, and that as the Tyrians never acknowledged this relation towards Zidon, the supposed connection between Tyre and Zidon is morally impossible. This is a very strong point; but, perhaps, not absolutely conclusive, as no one can prove that this was the custom of the Phœnicians at the very distant period when, alone, the Zidonians would have built Tyre, if they founded it at all; or that it would have applied not only to the conscious and deliberate founding of a colony, but likewise to such an almost accidental founding of a city as is implied in the account of Justin. Certainly there is otherwise nothing improbable in Zidonians having founded Tyre, as the Tyrians are called Zidonians; but the Zidonians are never called Tyrians. At any rate, this circumstance tends to show that in early times Zidon was the most influential of the two cities. This is shadowed forth in the book of Genesis by the statement that Zidon was the first-born of Canaan (x, 15), and is implied in the name of "Great Zidon," or "the metropolis Zidon," which is twice given to it in Joshua (xi, 8; xix, 28). It is confirmed, likewise, by Zidonians being used as the generic name of the Phœnicians, or Canaanites (xiii, 6; Judg. xviii, 7); and by the reason assigned for there being no deliverer to Laish when its peaceable inhabitants were massacred, that "it was far from Zidon;" whereas, if Tyre had been then of equal importance, it would have been more natural to mention Tyre, which professed substantially the same religion, and was almost twenty miles nearer (ver. 28). It is in accordance with the inference to be drawn from these circumstances that in the Homeric poems Tyre is not named, while there is mention both of Zidon and the Zidonians (Odys. xv, 425; Il. xxiii, 743); and the land of the Zidonians is called "Sidonia" (Odys. xiii, 285). One point, however, in the Homeric poems deserves to be specially noted concerning the Zidonians, that they are never here mentioned as traders, or praised for their nautical skill, for which they were afterwards so celebrated (Herod. vii, 44, 96). The traders are invariably known by the general name of Phœnicians, which would, indeed, include the Zidonians; but still the special praise of Zidonians was as skilled workmen. When Achilles distributed prizes at the games in honor of Patroclus, he gave as the prize of the swiftest runner a large silver bowl for mixing wine with water, which had been cunningly made by the skilful Zidonians, but which Phœnicians had brought over the sea (Homer, Il. xxiii, 743, 744). When Menelaus wished to give to Telemachus what was most beautiful and most valuable, he presented him with a similar mixing-bowl of silver, with golden rim—a divine work, the work of Hephestus—which had been a gift to Menelaus himself from Phœdimus, king of the Zidonians (Odys. iv, 614-618; xv, 425). Again, all the beautifully embroidered robes of Andromache, from which she selected one as an offering to Athens, were the productions of Zidonian women, which Paris, when coming to Troy with Helen, had brought from Sidonia (Il. vi, 289-295). But in no case is anything mentioned as having been brought from Zidon in Zidonian vessels or by Zidonian sailors. Perhaps at this time the Phœnician vessels were principally fitted out at seaports of Phœnicia to the north of Zidon.

But very soon after that period the splendor and power of Zidon began to pale before Tyre, which existed already at the time of Joshua, but as a dependency of Zidon. After the memorable defeat which the Zidonians suffered in the war with the king of Ashkelon (13th century B.C.), reported by Justin, when the Zidonians are said to have "retired to their ships and to have founded [?] refounded] Tyre," Zidon almost disappears from history for a time, so utterly enfeebled and insignificant had it become through the sudden and brilliant rise of its own daughter and rival, to whom all the noblest and most skilful of her children had fled. Its fate was almost the same as was that of Tyre herself when Dido-Elissa had founded Carthage, and drew all the most important elements from the old city to the "new town," which, it must not be forgotten, had originally been a Zidonian settlement under the name of Kakkabe.

From the time of Solomon to the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar Zidon is not often directly mentioned in the Bible, and it appears to have been subordinate to Tyre. When the people called "Zidonians" is mentioned, it sometimes seems that the Phœnicians of the plain of Zidon are meant; as, for example, when Solomon said to Hiram that there was none among the Jews that could skill to hew timber like the Zidonians (1 Kings v, 6); and, possibly, when Ethbaal, the father of Jezebel, is called their king (xvi, 31), who, according to Menander, in Josephus (Ant. viii, 13, 2), was king of the Tyrians. This may likewise be the meaning when Ashtoreth is called the goddess, or abomination, of the Zidonians (1 Kings xi, 5, 33; 2 Kings xxiii, 13); or when women of the Zidonians are mentioned in reference to Solomon (1 Kings xi, 1). And this seems to be equally true of the phrases "daughter of Zidon," and "merchants of Zidon," and even once of "Zidon" itself (Isa. xxiii, 2, 4, 12) in the prophecy of Isaiah against Tyre. There is no doubt, however, that Zidon itself, the city properly so called, was threatened by Joel (iii, 4) and Jeremiah (xxvii, 3). Still, all that is known respecting it during this epoch is very scanty, amounting to scarcely more than that one of its sources of gain was trade in slaves, in which the inhabitants did not shrink from selling inhabitants of Palestine; that the city was governed by kings (ibid.; xxv, 22); that, previous to the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, it had furnished mariners to Tyre (Ezek. xxvii, 8); that, at one period, it was subject, in some sense or other, to Tyre; and that, when Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, invaded Phœnicia, Zidon seized the opportunity to revolt. It seems strange to hear of the subjection of one great city to another great city only twenty miles off, inhabited by men of the same race, language, and religion; but the fact is rendered conceivable by the relation of Athens to its allies after the Persian war, and by the history of the Italian republics in the Middle Ages. It is not improbable that its rivalry with Tyre may have been influential in inducing Zidon, more than a century later, to submit to Nebuchadnezzar, apparently without offering any serious resistance.

During the Persian domination, Zidon seems to have attained its highest point of prosperity; and it is recorded that, towards the close of that period, it far excelled all other Phœnician cities in wealth and importance (Diod. Sic. xvi, 44; Mela, i, 12). It is very probable that the long siege of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar had tended not only to weaken and impoverish Tyre, but likewise to enrich Zidon at the expense of Tyre; as it was an obvious expedient for any Tyrian merchants, artisans, and sailors, who deemed resistance useless or unwise, to transfer their residence to Zidon. However this may be, in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece, the Zidonians were highly favored, and were a pre-eminent element of his naval power. When, from a hill near Abydos, Xerxes witnessed a boat-race in his fleet, the prize was gained by the Zidonians (Herod. vii, 44); when he reviewed his fleet, he sat beneath a golden canopy in a Zidonian galley (ibid. vii, 100); when he wished to examine the mouths of the river Peneus, he intrusted himself to a Zidonian galley, as was his wont on similar occasions (ibid. vii, 128); and when the Tyrants and general officers of his great expedition sat in order of honor, the king of the Zidonians sat first (ibid. viii, 67). Again, Herodotus states that the Phœnicians supplied the best vessels of the whole fleet; and of the Phœnicians, the Zidonians (vii, 96). Lastly, as Homer gives a vivid idea of the beauty of Achilles by saying that Nireus (thrice-named) was the most beautiful of all the Greeks who went to Troy, after the son of Peleus, so Herodotus completes the triumph of the Zidonians when he praises the vessels of Artemisia (probably for the daring of their crews) by saying that they were the most renowned of the whole fleet, "after the Zidonians" (vii, 9).

The prosperity of Zidon was suddenly cut short by an unsuccessful revolt against Persia, which led to one of the most disastrous catastrophes recorded in history. Unlike the siege and capture of Tyre by Alexander the Great, which is narrated by several writers, and which is of commanding interest through its relation to such a renowned conqueror, the fate of Zidon is only known through the history of Diodorus (xvi, 42-45), and is mainly connected with Artaxerxes Ochus (B.C. 359-338), a monarch who is justly regarded with mingled aversion and contempt. Hence the calamitous overthrow of Zidon has not, perhaps, attracted so much attention as it deserves. The principal circumstances were these. While the Persians were making preparations in Phœnicia to put down the revolt in Egypt, some Persian satraps and generals behaved oppressively and insolently to Zidonians in the Zidonian division of the city of Tripolis. On this the Zidonian people projected a revolt; and, having first concerted arrangements with other Phœnician cities and made a treaty with Nectanebus, they put their designs into execution. They commenced by committing outrages in a residence and park (παράδεισος) of the Persian king; they burned a large store of fodder which had been collected for the Persian cavalry; and they seized and put to death the Persians who had been guilty of insults towards the Zidonians. Afterwards, under their king Tennes, with the assistance from Egypt of four thousand Greek mercenaries under Mentor, they expelled the Persian satraps from Phœnicia; they strengthened the defences of their city; they equipped a fleet of one hundred triremes; and prepared for a desperate resistance. But their king Tennes proved a traitor to their cause; and, in performance of a compact with Ochus, he betrayed into the king's power one hundred of the most distinguished citizens of Zidon, who were all shot to death with javelins. Five hundred other citizens, who went out to the king with ensigns of supplication, shared the same fate; and, by concert between Tennes and Mentor, the Persian troops were admitted within the gates and occupied the city walls. The Zidonians, before the arrival of Ochus, had burned their vessels to prevent any one leaving the town; and when they saw themselves surrounded by the Persian troops, they adopted the desperate resolution of shutting themselves up with their families, and setting fire each man to his own house (B.C. 351). Forty thousand persons are said to have perished in the flames. Tennes himself did not save his own life, as Ochus, notwithstanding his promise to the contrary, put him to death. The privilege of searching the ruins was sold for money.

After this dismal tragedy Zidon gradually recovered from the blow; fresh immigrants from other cities must have settled in it; and probably many Zidonian sailors survived who had been plying their trade elsewhere in merchant vessels at the time of the capture of the city. The battle of Issus was fought about eighteen years afterwards (B.C. 333); and then the inhabitants of the restored city opened their gates to Alexander of their own accord, from hatred, as is expressly stated, of Darius and the Persians (Arrian, Anab. Al. ii, 15). The impolicy as well as the cruelty of Ochus in his mode of dealing with the revolt of Zidon now became apparent; for the Zidonian fleet, in joining Alexander, was an essential element of his success against Tyre. After aiding to bring upon Tyre as great a calamity as had afflicted their own city, they were so far merciful that they saved the lives of many Tyrians by concealing them in their ships and then transporting them to Zidon (Quint. Curtius, iv, 4, 15). From this time Zidon, being dependent on the fortunes of war in the contests between the successors of Alexander, ceases to play any important political part in history. It became, however, again a flourishing town; and Polybius (v, 70) incidentally mentions that Antiochus, in his war with Ptolemy Philopator, encamped over against Zidon (B.C. 218), but did not venture to attack it from the abundance of its resources and the great number of its inhabitants, either natives or refugees. Subsequently, according to Josephus (Ant. xiv, 10, 2), Julius Cæsar wrote a letter respecting Hircanus, which he addressed to the "Magistrates, Council, and Demos of Sidon." This shows that up to that time the Zidonians enjoyed the forms of liberty, though Dion Cassius says (lxiv, 7) that Augustus, on his arrival in the East, deprived them of it for seditious conduct. Not long after Strabo, in his account of Phœnicia, says of Tyre and Sidon, "Both were illustrious and splendid formerly, and now; but which should be called the capital of Phœnicia is a matter of dispute between the inhabitants" (xvi, 756). He adds that it is situated on the mainland, on a fine, naturally formed harbor. He speaks of the inhabitants as cultivating the sciences of arithmetic and astronomy; and says that the best opportunities were afforded in Zidon for acquiring a knowledge of these and of all other branches of philosophy. He adds that in his time there were distinguished philosophers — natives of Zidon — as Boethus, with whom he studied the philosophy of Aristotle, and his brother Diodotus. It is to be observed that both these names were Greek; and it is to be presumed that in Strabo's time Greek was the language of the educated classes at least, both in Tyre and Zidon. This is nearly all that is known of the state of Zidon when it was visited by Christ. It is about fifty miles distant from Nazareth, and is the most northern city which is mentioned in connection with his journeys. Pliny notes the manufacture of glass at Zidon (Nat. Hist. v, 17, 19); and during the Roman period we may conceive Tyre and Zidon as two thriving cities, each having an extensive trade, and each having its staple manufacture — the latter of glass, and Tyre of purple dyes from shell-fish.

Zidon is mentioned several times in the New Test. Jesus went once to the coasts of Tyre and Zidon (Matt. xv, 21); Sarepta, a city of Sidon, is referred to (Luke iv, 26); and Paul touched at Zidon on his voyage from Cæsarea to Rome (Acts xxvii, 3). Whatever be the doom of Tyre and Zidon, it shall be "more tolerable in the day of judgment" than that of Chorazin and Bethsaida, which saw the Saviour's mighty works, but were unconvinced by them; for had these towns been so privileged, "they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes."

Zidon was sometimes dignified with the Greek title of Navarchia (commander of ships), and was also called by the Romans Colonia Augusta and Metropolis. Christianity appears to have been introduced here at an early period (Acts xxvii, 3), and a bishop of Zidon attended the Council of Nicæa in 325. After the conquest of Syria by the Moslems (in 636), Zidon surrendered to her new masters without resistance, and it was then in an enfeebled condition. It shared generally the fortunes of Tyre, with the exception that it was several times taken and retaken during the wars of the Crusades, and suffered, accordingly, more than Tyre previous to the fatal year B.C. 1291. Since that time it never seems to have fallen quite so low as Tyre. Through Fakhr ed-Din, emir of the Druses between 1594 and 1634, and the settlement at Saïda of French commercial houses, it had a revival of trade in the 17th and part of the 18th century, and became the principal city on the Syrian coast for commerce between the East and the West (see Mémoires du Chevalier d'Ar- vieux [Paris, 1735], i, 294–379). This was put an end to at the close of last century by violence and oppression (Ritter, Erdkunde, 17. Theil, 1. Abth. 3. Buch, p. 405, 406), closing a period of prosperity in which the population of the city was at one time estimated at 20,000 inhabitants. Under the Egyptian rule the place again somewhat revived, but in 1840 its fortress was destroyed by the European allies.

3. Present Condition.—The town still shows signs of former wealth, and the houses are better constructed and more solid than those at Tyre, being many of them built of stone. Its chief exports are silk, cotton, and nutgalls (Robinson, Bibl. Res. iii, 418, 419). The trade between Syria and Europe, however, now mainly passes through Beirut, as its most important commercial centre; and the natural advantages of Beirut, in this respect, for the purposes of modern navigation, are so decided that it is certain to maintain its present superiority over Zidon and Tyre.

The modern Saidā has thus lost all and everything, and has once more become a poor miserable place, without trade or manufactures worthy of the name. To add to its desolation, an earthquake, which took place in 1837, destroyed about one hundred of its insignificant houses. Yet such is its favorable natural position, and the fruitfulness of the surrounding country, that in 1840 the district of Saidā contained about 70,000 inhabitants (above 36,000 Christians and Jews), whose annual tax amounted to about $570,000. It only requires some favorable turn in the tide of its affairs to make it once more lift up its head again as of yore. The population of Saidā is estimated at 10,000, of whom about 7000 are Moslems, 500 Jews, and the rest Catholics, Maronites, and Protestants. The city that once divided with Tyre the empire of the seas is now almost without a vessel, and its commerce is so insignificant that it would not repay even a periodical call of one of the passing steamers. Silk and fruit are its staple products; the latter is not surpassed in variety or quality by any other place in Syria. The harbor was formed by a low ridge of rocks running out from the northern point of the peninsula, parallel to the shore line. On one of these stands an old castle, which is connected with the town by a bridge of nine arches, forming the picturesque group so well known from engravings. The harbor was counted large in the days of ancient commerce, being sufficient to contain fifty galleys; but the Druse chief Fakhr ed-Din, fearing the Turks, caused it to be filled up with stones and earth, so that now only small boats can enter. Larger vessels, when they come here at all, anchor off to the northward, sheltered only from the south and east winds.

4. Antiquities.—Around the island, on which stand the ruins of the mediæval castle, particularly on the south-west side, are remains of quays built of large hewn stones, and similar remains flank the whole of the ridge which forms the northern harbor. The broad tongue of land which bounds the harbor on the west also bears remains of ancient walls, and on the east side there are two artificial square basins. Antiquities, chiefly of the Christian period, consisting of sarcophagi, cippi, statuettes, trinkets, and tear-vessels, are frequently dug up in the gardens around the town. The necropolis, situated in the limestone rocks adjacent, contains tombs of various plans and styles, which are minutely described by Renan (Mission en Phénicie, p. 117). Saidā, however, possesses another most vital interest, apart from its faded historical memories. It is the only spot in Phœnicia where Phœnician monuments with Phœnician inscriptions have been found as yet. While the great bulk of palæographical relics of this most important people had been found in its colonies, Saidā alone has furnished no less than three of the most ancient and lengthy inscriptions extant. On Jan. 19, 1855, one of the many sepulchral caves near the city was opened by chance, and there was discovered in it a sarcophagus, the lid of which represented the form of a mummy with the uncovered face of a man. Twenty-two lines of Phœnician writing were found engraved upon the chest of the royal personage—king Ashmanezzer II—whom it represents. A smaller, abbreviated inscription runs round the neck. The age of this monument has variously been conjectured as of the 11th century B.C. (Ewald), which is unquestionably wrong; further, as of the 7th, 6th, or 4th respectively by Hitzig, the duc de Luynes, Levy, and others. The inscriptions contain principally a solemn injunction, or rather an adjuration, not to disturb the royal remains. Besides this, there is an enumeration of the temples erected by the defunct in honor of the gods. This sarcophagus is now in the Nineveh division of the sculptures in the Louvre. At first sight the material of which it is composed may be easily mistaken, and it has been supposed to be black marble. On the authority, however, of M. Suchard of Paris, who has examined it very closely, it may be stated that the sarcophagus is of black syenite, which, as far as is known, is more abundant in Egypt than elsewhere. It may be added that the features of the countenance on the lid are decidedly of the Egyptian type, and the head-dress is Egyptian, with the head of a bird sculptured on what might seem the place of the right and left shoulder. There can therefore be little reason to doubt that this sarcophagus was either made in Egypt and sent thence to Zidon, or that it was made in Phœnicia in imitation of similar works of art in Egypt. The inscriptions themselves are the longest Phœnician inscriptions which have come down to our times. A translation of them was published by Prof. Dietrich at Marburg in 1855, and by Ewald at Göttingen in 1856. The king's title is "king of the Zidonians;" and, as is the case with Ethbaal, mentioned in the book of Kings (1 Kings xvi, 31), there must remain a certain doubt whether this was a title ordinarily assumed by kings of Zidon, or whether it had a wider signification. We learn from the inscription that the king's mother was a priestess of Ashtoreth.

The following is a portion of the most remarkable (larger) inscription divided into words (there is no division even of the letters in the original) according to the sense—in some instances merely conjectured—and transcribed into Hebrew characters, to which is subjoined a translation, principally following Munk and Levy, but occasionally differing from either:

(1.) In the month of Bul, in the year 14 (XIV) of my reigning, [1.] king Ashmanezar, king of the Zidonians, (2) son of king Tabnith, king of the Zidonians: spake king Ashmanezar, king of the Zidonians, saying, "I have been stolen away (3) before my time—a son of the flood [?] of days. The whilom Great is dumb—the Son of God is dead. And I rest in this grave, even in this tomb, (4) in the place which I have built. My adoration to all the ruling powers and all men: Let no one open this resting-place, and (5) not search with us for treasure, for there is no treasure with us; and let him not bear away the couch of my rest, and not trouble (6) us on this resting-place by disturbing the couch of my slumbers. Even if people should persuade thee, do not listen to their speech. For all the ruling powers and (7) all men who should open the tomb of this my rest, or any man who should carry away the couch of my rest, or any man who troubles me or (8) this my couch, unto them there shall be no rest with the departed; they shall not be buried in a grave, and there shall be to them neither son nor seed (9) in their stead, and the holy gods will send over them a mighty king who will rule over them, and (10) cut them off with their dynasty. If any human being should open this resting-place, and any man should carry away (11) this tomb—be he of royal seed or a man of the people—there shall be unto them neither root below nor (12) fruit above, nor honor among the living under the sun. . . ."

The shorter inscription—round the king's neck—contains seven lines, as follows:

1. בירחבלשנתעסרוארבער . . . צרנים
2. לאמרננולחבלעתיבנסכומא . . . אליפחחא
3. משכבוואליבקשבנמכאממ . . . אלחשמע
4. ברנמכלמלמלנחלוארמאשפחחל . . . בקבר
5. אליכנלמבנוורעחתחמיוסנרנמחאלנל . . . ישאחית
6. מחואיתורעמלכתחאמארמחחמ . . . מחאנכ
7. כאנכאשמע . . . מחאנכ

The third inscription we have mentioned was discovered a few years ago by consul Moore on another locality near Saida. It is found on a block sixty-nine centimetres in height, thirty-eight in length, which evidently was once used for building purposes. It is now in the possession of count de Vogué. The inscription reads as follows:

בירח . . . מ . . . בשח
ימלךברעשתרחמלך
צרנמכבברעשתרח
מלךצרנמאחשרנאר . . .
לילעשתרח . . .

The fragmentary nature of this inscription allows of little certainty in its deciphering, save with respect to a few proper names. See PHœNICIA.

Zidon'ian (Heb. sing. Tsidoni', צִדְוֹנִי, Ezek. xxxii, 30; plur. Tsidonim', צִדְוֹנִיִּים, [the full form], or צִדְוֹנִים [Ezra iii, 7, "they of Zidon"]; and [1 Kings xi, 5, 33] Tsidoni', צִדְוֹנִי, Sept. Σιδωνιοι [except Ezek. xxxii, 30, σαρπηγοι Ἀσσοῦ]; Vulg. Sidonii [except ver. 30, venutores]; A. V. Sidonians, 2 Kings xxiii, 13), the inhabitants of Zidon. They were among the nations of Canaan left to practice the Israelites in the art of war (Judg. iii, 8), and colonies of them appear to have spread up into the hill country from Lebanon to Misrephoth-maim (Josh. xiii, 4, 6), whence in later times they hewed cedar-trees for David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxii, 4). They oppressed the Israelites on their first entrance into the country (Judg. x, 12), and appear to have lived a luxurious, reckless life (xviii, 7); they were skilful in hewing timber (1 Kings v, 6), and were employed for this purpose by Solomon. They were idolaters, and worshipped Ashtoreth as their tutelary goddess (xi, 5, 33; 2 Kings xxiii, 13), as well as the sun-god Baal, from whom their king was named (1 Kings xvi, 31). The term Zidonian among the Hebrews appears to have been extended in meaning as that of Phœnician among the Greeks. Zidonian women (Tsedeniyoth', צִדְוֹנִיּוֹת; Sept. Σύραι; Vulg. Sidonie) were in Solomon's harem (xi, 1). See ZIDON.

Ziegelbauer, MAGNOALD, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1696 at Elwangen, Suabia. In 1707 he entered the brotherhood of the Benedictine friars, and taught philosophy and theology at the convent of Zwiefalten and that of Reichenau. After having resided for a time near the learned priest Bessel of Gottenich, who had been appointed to instruct the young friars, he passed many years at Vienna, and at Braunau and Prague, in Bohemia, and assisted in reorganizing the academic college at the last-named place. In 1747 he went to occupy the position of secretary of the Academy of the Unknown at Olmütz. Here he prepared a book in which he wished to call the attention of the pope to numerous abuses introduced among the clergy of these countries. Those interested in suppressing the publication of this work administered to him a poison powder by a physician. He died June 4, 1750, at Olmütz. We have from Ziegelbauer, Historische Nachricht von der S. Georgenfuhrne (Vienna, 1785):—Acta S. Stephani Protomartyris (ibid. 1786), in German:—Novus Rei Litteraria Ord. S. Benedicti Conspectus (Ratisbon, 1789), a prospectus of a large and excellent collection which was published by Légitime after his death under the title Historia Rei Litter. Ord. S. Benedicti (Augsburg, 1754):—Épître Historica Monasterii Brennoniensis prope Pragm (Cologne, 1740):—Sponsalia Virginis (Königshofen, 1740):—Historia Didactica de Crucis Cultu in Ord. S. Benedicti (Vienna, 1746):—Centifolium Camaldulense (ibid. 1750), which is a prospectus of the historical library of the Camaldule. Ziegelbauer left in manuscript several works, such as Olomucium Sacrum and Bibliotheca Bohemica. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Zif (Heb. זִיף, זִי, bloom; Sept. Ζιού v. r. Νεϊσώ, Vulg. Zio), the early name (1 Kings vi, 1, 37) of the second Hebrew month IYAR (q. v.), corresponding to April or May. See CALENDAR.

Zi'ha (Heb. Tsicha', צִיחָה, parched; Sept. Σιά v. r. Σηά, Σουαά, Σουδία, etc.; Vulg. Siha, Soha, Souha), the name of two Hebrews.

1. One of the Nethinim whose "children" returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 43; Neh. vii, 46). B.C. ante 536.

2. First named of the two chief Nethinim resident in Ophel after the Captivity (Neh. xi, 21). B.C. 536.

Zilm. See TSIVIM.

Zik'lag (Heb. Tsiklag', צִקְלָג [in pause צִקְלָג, fully Tsiklag', צִקְלָג, 1 Chron. xii, 1, 20], winding [First]; Sept. Σεκελάκ or Σικελάγ v. r. Σικελά, etc.; Josephus, Σικελλα, Ant. vi, 13, 10; 14, 6; Steph. Byz. Σέικελα; Vulg. Siceleg), a place which possesses a special interest from its having been the residence and the private property of David. It is first mentioned in the catalogue of the towns of Judah in Josh. xv, where it is enumerated (ver. 31) among those of the extreme south, between Hormah (or Zephath) and Madmannah (possibly Beth-marcaboth). It next occurs, in the same connection, among the places which were allotted out of the territory of Judah to Simeon (xix, 5). We next encounter it in the possession of the Philistines (1 Sam. xxvii, 6), when it was, at David's request, bestowed upon him by Achish king of Gath. He resided there for a year and four months (ver. 7; xxxi, 14, 26; 1 Chron. xii, 1, 20; Josephus [Ant. vi, 13, 10] gives this as one month and twenty days). It was there he received the news of Saul's death (2 Sam. i, 1; iv, 10). He then relinquished it for Hebron (ii, 1). Ziklag is finally mentioned, in company with Beer-sheba, Hazar-shual, and other towns of the south, as being inhabited by the people of Judah after their return from the Captivity (Neh. xi, 28).

The situation of the town is difficult to determine, notwithstanding so many notices. On the one hand, that it was in "the south" (Négeb) seems certain, both from the towns named with it, and also from its mention with "the south of the Cherethites" and "the south of Caleb," some of whose descendants we know were at Ziph and Maon, perhaps even at Paran (1 Sam. xxv, 1). On the other hand, this is difficult to reconcile with its connection with the Philistines, and with the fact—which follows from the narrative of 1 Sam. xxx (see ver. 9, 10, 21)—that it was north of the brook Besor. The word employed in xxvii, 5, 7, 11, to denote the region in which it stood is peculiar. It is not hash-Shephelah, as it must have been had Ziklag stood in the ordinary lowland of Philistia, but has-Sadeh, which Prof. Stanley (Sin. and Pal. App. § 15) renders "the field." On the whole, though the temptation is strong to suppose (as some have suggested) that there were two places of the same name, the only conclusion seems to be that Ziklag was in the south country, with a portion of which the Philistines had a connection, which may have lasted from the time of their residence there in the days of Abraham and Isaac.

Ziklag does not appear to have been known to Eusebius and Jerome, or to any of the older travellers. Mr. Rowlands, however, in his journey from Gaza to Suez in 1842 (in Williams, Holy City, i, 463-468), was told of "an ancient site called Ashûj, or Kashûj, with some ancient walls," three hours east of Sebâth, which again was two hours and a half south of Khâlâsa. This he considers as identical with Ziklag. Dr. Robinson had previously (in 1838) heard of Ashûj as lying south-west of Milh, on the way to Abdeh (Bibl. Res. ii, 201), a position not discordant with that of Mr. Rowlands. The identification is supported by Mr. Wilton (Negeb, p. 209); but in the Arabic form of the name the similarity which prompted Mr. Rowlands's conjecture almost entirely disappears (צִקְלָג, צִקְלָג).—Smith. The English engineers think that they have discovered the name and site of Ziklag in the ruins still called Khirbet Zuheikikah, occupying three small hills, nearly half a mile apart, in the form of an equilateral triangle, together with ancient cities, situated in an open, rolling plain eleven miles east-southeast of Gaza, and nineteen south-west of Beit-Jibrin (Quar. Report of "Pal. Explorer, Fund," Jan. 1878, p. 12 sq.). See SIMÉON.

Zil'lah (Heb. Tsillah, צִלָּה, shade; Sept. Σελλά; Vulg. Sella), last named of the two wives of Lamech the Cainite, to whom he addressed his song (Gen. iv, 19, 22, 23). B.C. cir. 3500. She was the mother of Tubal-Cain and Naamah. Dr. Kalisch (Comm. on Gen.) regards the names of Lamech's wives and of his daughters as significant of the transition into the period of art which took place in his time, and the corresponding change in the position of the woman. "Naamah signifies the lovely, beautiful woman; while the wife of the first man was simply Eve, the life-giving. . . . The women were, in the age of Lamech, no more regarded merely as the propagators of the human family; beauty and gracefulness began to command homage. . . . Even the wives of Lamech manifest the transition into this epoch of beauty; for while one wife, Zillah, reminds still of assistance and protection ('shadow'), the other, Adah, bears a name almost synonymous with Naamah, and likewise signifying ornament and loveliness." In the apocryphal book of Jasher, Adah and Zillah are both daughters of Cainan. Adah bore children, but Zillah was barren till her old age, in consequence of some noxious draught which her husband gave her to preserve her beauty and to prevent her from bearing. See LAMECH.

Zil'pah (Heb. Tsilpah, צִלְפָּה, a trickling; Sept. Ζελφά v. r. Ζελφάν; Josephus, Ζελφά, Ant. i, 19, 7; Vulg. Zelpha), a female servant of Laban, whom he gave to Leah on her marriage with Jacob (Gen. xxix, 24), and whom Leah eventually induced him to take as a concu-bine wife, in which capacity she became the mother of Gad and Asher (xxx, 9-13; xxxv, 26; xxxvii, 2; xli, 18). B.C. 1919.

Zil'thai (Heb. Tsiltay, צִילְתַּי, shade or my shadow; Sept. Σαλαθι v. r. Σαλει and Σαμαθι; Vulg. Sala-thi and Selathai), the name of two Hebrews.

1. Fifth named of the nine "sons" of Shimhi, and one of the Benjamite chiefs resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii, 20). B.C. post 1612.

2. Last named of the seven Manassite captains who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 20). B.C. 1054.

Zim'mah (Heb. Zimmah, צִמְמָה, purpose; Sept. Ζεμμά v. r. Ζαμμά and Ζεμάθ; Vulg. Zemna or Zamma), the name of two or three Levites.

1. A Gershonite, "son" of Jahath and father of Joah (1 Chron. vi, 20); probably the same with the "son" of Shimei and father of Jahath (ver. 42). B.C. post 1874.

2. Father or ancestor of Joah, which latter was a Gershonite in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix, 12). B.C. ante 726. At a much earlier period we find the same collocation of names, Zimmah and Joah as father and son (1 Chron. vi, 20). This is but an evidence of the frequent recurrence of the same names in a family (comp. "Mahath the son of Amasai" in 2 Chron. xxix, 12 with the same in 1 Chron. vi, 35; "Joel the son of Azariah" in 2 Chron. xxix, 12 and 1 Chron. vi, 36; and "Kish the son of Abdi" in 2 Chron. xxix, 12 with "Kishi the son of Abdi" in 1 Chron. vi, 44).

Zim'ran (Heb. Zimraan, צִמְרָן, celebrated; Sept. Σομπράν v. r. Ζεμπράμ, Σεβράν, etc.; Vulg. Zama and Zumram), first named of the nine sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv, 2; 1 Chron. i, 32). B.C. cir. 2020. His descendants are not mentioned, nor is any hint given that he was the founder of a tribe; the contrary would rather appear to be the case. Some would identify Zimran with the Zimri of Jer. xxv, 25, but these lay too far to the north. The Greek form of the name, as found in the Sept., has suggested a comparison with Ζαβράμ, the chief city of the Cinadocolpita, who dwelt on the Red Sea, west of Mecca. But this is extremely doubtful, for this tribe, probably the same with the ancient Kenda, was a branch of the Joktanite Arabs, who in the most ancient times occupied Yemen, and may only have come into possession of Zabram at a later period (Knobel, Gen.). Hitzig and Lengerke propose to connect the name Zimran with Zimris, a district of Ethiopia mentioned by Pliny (xxxvi, 25); but Grotius, with more plausibility, finds a trace of it in the Zamerni, a tribe of the interior of Arabia (Pliny, vi, 32). The identification of Zimran with the modern Beni Omran and the Bani Zomaneis of Diodorus, proposed by Mr. Forster (Geogr. of Arabia, i, 431), cannot be seriously maintained. Winer (Handb. s. v.) suggests the Zimara of Asia Minor (Ptolemy, v, 7, 2; Pliny, x, 20) or Zimyra (Ζυμύρα) of Asia (Ptolemy, vi, 17, 8). See ARABIA.

Zim'ri (Heb. Zimri, צִמְרִי, my song or celebrated; Sept. Ζαμβρι; Josephus, Ζαμάρης, Ant. viii, 12, 5; Vulg. Zambri), the name of several Hebrews, and apparently one foreign tribe.

1. First named of the five sons of Zerah the son of Judah (1 Chron. ii, 6). B.C. post 1874.

2. The son of Salu, a Simeonite chieftain, slain by Phinehas with the Midianitish princess Cozbi (Numb. xxv, 14). B.C. 1618. When the Israelites at Shittim were smitten with plagues for their impure worship of Baal Peor, and were weeping before the tabernacle, Zimri, with a shameless disregard of his own high position and the sufferings of his tribe, brought into their presence the Midianites, in the sight of Moses and in the sight of the whole congregation. The fierce anger of Phinehas was aroused, and in the swift vengeance with which he pursued the offenders, he gave the first indication of that uncompromising spirit which characterized him in later life. The whole circumstance is much softened in the narrative of Josephus (Ant. iv, 6, 10-12), and in the hands of the apologist is divested of all its vigor and point. In the Targum of Jonathan ben-Uzziel several traditional details are added. Zimri retorts upon Moses that he himself had taken to wife a Midianitess, and twelve miraculous signs attend the vengeance of Phinehas. See PHINEHAS.

In describing the scene of this tragedy an unusual word is employed, the force of which is lost in the rendering "tent" of the A. V. of Numb. xxv, 8. It was not the ôhel, or ordinary tent of the encampment, but the קִבְּבָה, kubbâh (whence Span. alcoba and our alcove), or dome-shaped tent, to which Phinehas pursued his victims. Whether this was the tent which Zimri occupied as chief of his tribe, and which was in consequence more elaborate and highly ornamented than the rest, or whether it was, as Gesenius suggests, one of the tents which the Midianites used for the worship of Peor, is not to be determined, though the latter is favored by the rendering of the Vulg. lupanar. The word does not occur elsewhere in Hebrew. In the Syriac it is rendered a "cell," or inner apartment of the tent. See HAREM.

3. The son of Azmaveth (rather Jehoadah or Jarah) and father of Moza in the lineage of king Saul (1 Chron. viii, 36; ix, 42). B.C. cir. 945.

4. The fifth sovereign of the separate kingdom of Israel, of which he occupied the throne for the brief period of seven days in the year B.C. 926. Originally in command of half the chariots in the royal army, he gained the crown by the murder of king Elah son of Baasha, who, after reigning for something more than a year (comp. 1 Kings xvi, 8, 10), was indulging in a drunken revel in the house of his steward Arza at Tirzah, then the capital. In the midst of this festivity Zimri killed him, and immediately afterwards all the rest of Baasha's family. But the army which at that time was besieging the Philistine town of Gibbethon, when they heard of Elah's murder, proclaimed their general Omri king. He immediately marched against Tirzah and took the city. Zimri retreated into the innermost part of the late king's palace, set it on fire, and perished in the ruins (ver. 9-20). Ewald's inference from Jezebel's speech to Jehu (2 Kings ix, 31) that on Elah's death the queen-mother welcomed his murderer with smiles and blandishments seems rather arbitrary and far-fetched. The word is זִמְרִי, which Ewald (after J. D. Michaelis) in both the above passages insists on translating "harem," with which word he thinks that it is etymologically connected, and hence seeks confirmation of his view that Zimri was a voluptuous slave of women. But its root seems to be זָרַח, "to be high" (Gesenius); and in other passages, especially Prov. xviii, 19, the meaning is "a lofty fortress," rather than "a harem." Ewald, in his sketch of Zimri, is perhaps somewhat led astray by the desire of finding a historical parallel with Sardanapalus. See ISRAEL.

5. An obscure name, mentioned (Jer. xxv, 25) in probable connection with Dedan, Tema, Buz, Arabia (עֲרַב), the mingled people "ereb" (עֵרֶב), all of which immediately precede it, besides other peoples, and followed by Elam, the Medes, and others. The passage is of wide comprehension, but the reference, as indicated above, seems to be to a tribe of the sons of the East, the Beni-Kedem. Nothing further is known respecting Zimri, but it may possibly be the same as, or derived from, ZIMRAN (q. v.).

Zin (Heb. Tsin, צִן [with h directive, Tsinah, צִנָּה, Numb. xxxiv, 4; or Tsin'nah, צִנָּה, Josh. xv, 8], a flat [plain or palm-tree]; Sept. Ziv v. r. Σινά, etc.; Vulg. Sin), a wilderness (מִדְבָּר) or open, uncultivated region on the south of Palestine and westward from Idumæa, in which was situated the city of Kadesh-barnea (Numb.

xiii, 22; xx, 1; xxvii, 14; xxxiii, 36; xxxiv, 8; Deut. xxxii, 51; Josh. xv, 1). It evidently was a portion of the desert tract between the Dead Sea, Ghôr, and Arabah (possibly including the two latter, or portions of them) on the east, and the general plateau of the Th which stretches westward. The country in question consists of two or three successive terraces of mountain converging to an acute angle (like stairs where there is a turn in the flight) at the Dead Sea's southern verge, towards which also they slope. Here the drainage finds its chief vent by the Wady el-Fikreh into the Ghôr, the remaining waters running by smaller channels into the Arabah, and ultimately by the Wady el-Jeib also to the Ghôr. Judging from natural features in the vagueness of authority, it is likely that the portion between and drained by these wadies is the region in question; but where it ended westward, whether at any of the above-named terraces or blending imperceptibly with that of Paran, is quite uncertain. Josephus (Ant. iv, 4, 6) speaks of a "hill called Sin" (Σιν) where Miriam, who died in Kadesh, when the people had "come to the desert of Zin," was buried. This "Sin" of Josephus may recall the name Zin, and, being applied to a hill, may, perhaps, indicate the most singular and wholly isolated conical acclivity named Moderah (Madura, or Madara), standing a little south of the Wady Fikreh, near its outlet into the Ghôr. This would precisely agree with the tract of country above indicated (Numb. xx, 1; see Seetzen, Reisen, iii, Hebron to Madara; Wilton, Negeb, p. 127, 134). See KADESH.

Zi'na (Heb. Zina, צִנָּה, perhaps abundance; Sept. Zizâ, Vulg. Ziza), second named of the four sons of Shimei the Gershonite (1 Chron. xxiii, 10). B.C. 1043. In ver. 11 he is called ZIZAH (q. v.), and some MSS. here have Ziza (צִיזָה), like the Sept. and Vulg.

Zinzendorf, NICHOLAS LEWIS, Count von, D.D., founder of the Herrnhuters, or Moravian Brethren, was born at Dresden, May 26, 1700. According to his own account (in his Natural Reflections on Various Subjects), he aspired to form a society of believers from his boyhood. On coming of age in 1721, he settled, with this object in view, on his estate at Berthelsdorf, in Upper Lusatia, and was there joined by several proselytes from Bohemia. By 1732 the numbers who had flocked around him amounted to six hundred, and all these were subject to a species of ecclesiastical discipline or monastic despotism which brought them in spirit and body, or was intended so to do, under the most absolute control of their leader. From an adjacent hill called the Huthberg was derived the name of the colony, Huth des Herrn, contracted to Herrnhut, and from this the name of the sect. The appellation Moravian Brethren was assumed for his party by count Zinzendorf for the sake of connection with the separatists of Bohemia and Moravia, partly derived from Valdo, the forerunner of Luther: some of these, indeed, were among his colonists. Zinzendorf assumed various titles as the chief of the Herrnhuters, all of which really pointed to a pontificate as his function. From 1733 his missionaries began to spread, not only over parts of Europe, but in Greenland and North America; even Africa and China were not forgotten. To him, in fact, Wesley was directly indebted both for his religious organization and his missionary plans which became so eminently successful, that indefatigable laborer having passed some time with count Zinzendorf at Herrnhut. The interference of the government with the count's projects can hardly be regarded as a measure of persecution, as secret doctrines were undoubtedly held by him, and thus motives given to his followers, and objects sought, of which, whether good or evil, the established authorities could take no cognizance. The history of the sect is curious and interesting. Next to its organization in classes, the use of singing, which furnished the Wesleys with a valuable hint, is one of its most remarkable characteristics; under this head some singular details might be given. Something might be said also on the connection of a certain marriage-rite with the theory of regeneration, the efficacy of which was probably tried by the Herrnhuters in common with the Quakers. Count Zinzendorf died among his people, May 9, 1760. See MORAVIANS. (W. P. S.)

Zi'on (Heb. Tziyon, צִיּוֹן, sunny [Gesen.] or fort [Fürst]; Sept. [usually] and New Test. Σιών, Vulg. Sion; A. V. "Sion" in New Test.), a prominent hill (הַר) of Jerusalem, being generally regarded as the south-westernmost and the highest of those on which the city was built. It included the most ancient part of the city with the citadel, and, as first occupied for a palace, was called the city of David (2 Chron. v, 2). Being the original site of the tabernacle pitched by David for the reception of the ark, it was also called the holy hill, or hill of the sanctuary (Psa. ii, 6). By the Hebrew prophets the name is often put for Jerusalem itself (Isa. viii, 18; x, 24; xxx, 19; xxxiii, 14; Psa. xlviii, 2, 11, 12; comp. Rom. ix, 33; xi, 26; 1 Pet. ii, 6; Rev. xiv, 1); also for its inhabitants, sometimes called sons or daughters of Zion (Isa. i, 27; xii, 6; xl, 9; xlix, 14; lii, 1; Psa. ix, 14; xcvi, 8; Zech. ii, 7, 10; ix, 9, 13; Zeph. iii, 14, 16; Joel ii, 28; Matt. xxi, 5; John xii, 15); and for the spiritual Zion, the church or city of the living God (Heb. xii, 22, 28; Gal. iv, 26; Rev. iii, 12; xxi, 2, 10).

There never has been any considerable doubt as to the identity of this hill. Josephus, indeed, singularly enough appears to ignore the name Zion; but he evidently calls the same hill the site of the Upper City. In modern times Fergusson has attempted to identify it with Mount Moriah (Jerusalem Revisited; the Temple, etc.), and Capt. Warren, with equal futility, has contended for its identity with Akra (The Temple or the Tomb [Lond. 1880]). The mistake of the latter has originated from not observing that Josephus uses ἀκρά, the summit, in two senses: (a) the citadel on Mount Zion (Ant. vii, 3, 1, where it is clearly distinguished from "the lower city"), and (b) the hill Akra (ibid. 2, where it is clearly distinguished from "the upper city"). See AKRA.

Of the several hills on which Jerusalem was built, Zion is the largest and, in many respects, the most interesting. It extends considerably farther south than the opposite ridge of Moriah and Ophel. The western and southern sides rise abruptly from the bed of the valley of Hinnom, and appear to have originally consisted of a series of rocky precipices rising one above another like stairs; but now they are partially, and in some places deeply, covered with loose soil and the débris of buildings. The southern brow of Zion is bold and prominent; and its position, separated from other heights and surrounded by deep valleys, makes it seem loftier than any other point in the city, though it is in reality lower than the ground at the north-west corner of the wall. The elevation of the hill above the valley of Hinnom at the point where it bends eastward is 300 feet, and above the Kidron, at en-Rogel, 600 feet. On the south-east, Zion slopes down in a series of cultivated terraces steeply, though not abruptly, to the site of the "King's Gardens," where Hinnom, the Tyropæon, and the Kidron unite. Here and round to the south the declivities are sprinkled with olive-trees, which grow luxuriantly among narrow strips of corn. The scene cannot but recall the words of Micah, "Zion shall be ploughed like a field" (Jer. xxvi, 18). On the east, the descent to the Tyropæon is at first gradual, but as we proceed northward to the modern wall it becomes steeper; and about 300 yards within the wall, directly facing the south-west angle of the Haram, there is a precipice of rock from twenty to thirty feet high. The declivity is here encumbered with heaps of filth and rubbish, overgrown in places with prickly-pear. The Tyropæon was anciently much deeper at this point than it is now; it has been filled up by the ruins of the bridge, the Temple walls, and the palaces of Zion to a depth of more than 130 feet. The best view of the eastern slopes of Zion and the southern section of the Tyropæon is obtained from the top of the wall in descending from Zion Gate to the Dung Gate.

From the descriptions and incidental notices of Josephus the following facts may be gathered: that the "Upper City," built on Zion, was surrounded by ravines; that it was separated from the "Lower City" (Akra) by a valley called the Tyropæon; that upon a crest of rock thirty cubits high on the northern brow of Zion stood three great towers—Hippicus, Phasaelus, and Mariamne; that the wall enclosing the Upper City on the north ran by these towers to a place called the Xystus and joined the western wall of the Temple area; that there was a gate in that western wall northward of this point of junction opening into Akra; that the Xystus was near to and commanded by the western wall of the Temple area, though not united to it, and that the royal palace adjoined and overlooked the Xystus on the west, while it was also attached to the great towers above mentioned; and, lastly, that both the Xystus and palace were connected at their southern end by a bridge with the Temple area (see Josephus, War, v, 4; vi, 6, 2; ii, 16, 8; Ant. xv, 11, 5).

On the summit of Zion there is a level tract extending in length from the citadel to the Tomb of David, about 600 yards; and in breadth from the city wall to the eastern side of the Armenian convent, about 250 yards. A much larger space, however, was available for building purposes, and was at one time occupied. Now not more than one half of this space is enclosed by the modern wall, while fully one third of that enclosed is taken up with the barrack-yards, the convent gardens, and the waste ground at the city gate. All without the wall, with the exception of the cemeteries and the cluster of houses round the Tomb of David, is now cultivated in terraces and thinly sprinkled with olive-trees.

Zion was the first spot in Jerusalem occupied by buildings. Upon it stood the stronghold of the Jebusites, which so long defied the Israelites, and was at last captured by king David (Numb. xiii, 29; Josh. xv, 63; Jud. i, 21; 2 Sam. v, 5-8). Upon it that monarch built his palace, and there for more than a thousand years the kings and princes of Israel lived and ruled (ver. 9 etc.). In Zion, too, was David buried, and fourteen of his successors on the throne were laid near him in the royal tomb (1 Kings ii, 10; xi, 43; xiv, 31, etc.). Zion was the last spot that held out when the Romans under Titus captured the city. When the rest of Jerusalem was in ruins, when the enemy occupied the courts of the Temple, the remnant of the Jews from the walls of Zion haughtily refused the terms of the conqueror, and perished in thousands around and within the palace of their princes.

The city which stood on Zion was called successively by several names. It was probably the Salem of Melchizedek (comp. Gen. xiv, 18 with Psa. lxxvi, 2); then it became Jebus under the Jebusites, so called from a son of Canaan (Gen. x, 16; 1 Chron. xi, 4, 5); then the "city of David" and Jerusalem (2 Sam. v, 7). Josephus, as above stated, calls it the "Upper City," adding that it was known also in his day as the "Upper Market." See JERUSALEM.

Zi'or (Heb. Tsior, צִיֹּר, smallness; Sept. Ζῴω v. r. Σωπαῖς; Vulg. Sior), a town in the highland district of Judah (Josh. xv, 54), where it is mentioned in the group around Hebron to the south. See JUDAH, TRIBE OF. Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Ζῴω) call it a village between Jerusalem and Eleutheropolis. It probably corresponds to the small village still called Sair on the road about six miles north-east of Hebron towards Tekoa (Robinson, Bibl. Res. i, 488), traditionally pointed out as the site of the grave of Esau (Schwarz, Palest. p. 106).

Ziph (Heb. id. זִיפ, battlement [Gesen.] or melting-place [Fürst]; Sept. Ζῖβ or Ζῖφ, with many v. rr.; Vulg. Ziph or Siph), the name of a man and of one or two places in Judah.

1. First named of the four sons of Jehaleleel of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 16). B.C. post 1618.

2. A town apparently in the south or Simeonitish part of Judah (Josh. xv, 24), where it is mentioned between Ithnan and Telem; but the enumeration and the absence of the copula require us to join it with the former, i. e. Ithnan-ziph, and in that case it may be an appendage retaining a trace of the Zephath (q. v.) of that region. See ITHNAN.

3. A town in the mountain district of Judah (Josh. xv, 55), where it is mentioned between Carmel and Jutta, in the south-east group. See JUDAH, TRIBE OF. The place is immortalized by its connection with David, some of whose greatest perils and happiest escapes took place in its neighborhood (1 Sam. xxiii, 14, 15, 24; xxvi, 2). It had been built by Mesha the son of Caleb (1 Chron. ii, 42), and was eventually fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi, 8). "Zib" is mentioned in the Onomasticon as eight miles east of Hebron; "the village," adds Jerome, "in which David hid is still shown." This can hardly be the spot above referred to, unless the distance and direction have been stated at random, or the passage is corrupt both in Eusebius and Jerome. Elsewhere (under "Zeib" and "Ziph") they place it near Carmel, and connect it with Ziph the descendant of Caleb. The place in question is doubtless the Tell Zif, about three miles south of Hebron, a rounded hill of some hundred feet in height, with a spring adjacent.

About half a mile east of the tell are some considerable ruins, standing at the head of two small wadies, which, commencing here, run off towards the Dead Sea. These ruins are pronounced by Robinson (Bibl. Res. i, 492) to be those of the ancient Ziph. There was originally a desert (מִדְבָּר, chôresh, 1 Sam. xxiii, 15) attached to the place, traces of the latter of which have been supposed to exist in the present Khirbet Khoreisa, about one mile south of Tell Zif (Quar. Statement of the "Palest. Explor. Fund." Jan. 1875, p. 45). See HACHILAH.

Zi'phah (Heb. Ziphah, זִיפָה, fem. of Ziph [lent, Fürst]; Sept. Ζεφά v. r. Ζαφά or Ζαυφά; Vulg. Zipha), second named of the four "sons" of Jehaleleel of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 16). B.C. post 1618.

Ziph'im (Psa. liv, title). See ZIPHITE.

Ziph'ion (Gen. xlv, 16). See ZEPHON.

Ziph'ite (Heb. with the art. [except 1 Sam. xxiii, 19] haz-Ziphi, הַזִּיפִי [always in the plur., but abbreviated זִיפִי in ver. 19; xxvi, 1]; Sept. Ζειφαῖοι; Vulg. Ziphai; A. V. "Ziphites," but "Ziphims" in Psa. liv, title), the patril designation of the inhabitants of the town of ZIPH (q. v.).

Zi'phron [some Ziph'ron] (Heb. Ziphron, זִיפְרֹן, fragrance [Gesen.] or beautiful top [Fürst]; Sept. Ζεφρωνά v. r. Δεφρωνά; Vulg. Zephrona, both from the directive פֶּן of the Heb.), a place on the northern boundary of the Promised Land, and consequently also of Naphtali (Numb. xxxiv, 9, where it is mentioned between Zedad and Hazar-enan; possibly the present Kaukaba, a village high up the western slope of Wady et-Teim (Robinson, Later Res. p. 385). In the parallel passage (Ezek. xlvii, 16), Hazar-haticon (q. v.) occurs in a similar connection. According to Jerome (ad loc. Ezech.), it was the Zephyrium Cilicis (Mannert, VII, ii, 66, 76). But this is too far away. Wetzstein thinks it is the extensive river Zifran, fourteen hours north-east of Damascus (Reisebericht über Hauran, p. 88); but this is equally out of the question (comp. Schwarz, Palest. p. 27). See TRIBE.

Zip'por (Heb. Tsippor, צִפּוֹר, [briefly צִפּ, Numb. xxii, 10; xxiii, 18], sparrow [comp. Zipporah]; Sept. Σεφώρ; Vulg. Sephor), father of Balak, king of Moab, who is always designated by this patronymic title (xxii, 2, 4, 10, 16; xxiii, 18; Josh. xxiv, 9; Judg. xi, 25). B.C. ante 1618. He is possibly the king referred to in Numb. xxi, 26. See BALAK; MOAB.

Zippo'rah (Heb. Tsipporah, צִפּוֹרָה, fem. of Zippor; Sept. Σεφώρα; Josephus, Σεφώρα, Ant. iii, 3, 1; Vulg.

Tell Zif. (From a photograph by the Editor.)

Sephora), one of the seven daughters of Renel or Jethro, the priest of Midian, who became the wife of Moses and mother of his two sons Gershom and Eliezer (Exod. ii, 21; iv, 25; xviii, 2; comp. ver. 6). The most noteworthy incident in her life is the account of the circumcision of the former, who had remained for some time after his birth uncircumcised; but an illness into which Moses fell in a khan when on his way to Pharaoh, being accounted a token of the divine displeasure, led to the circumcision of the child, when Zipporah, having, it appears, reluctantly yielded to the ceremony, exclaimed, "Surely a bloody husband thou art to me" (iv, 26; see Frischmuth, De Circumcisione Zipporæ [Jen. 1663]; Hase, De Sponso Sanguineo [Hal. 1753]). This event seems to have caused some alienation of feeling, for Moses sent his wife back to her father, by whom she was again brought to her husband while in the desert, when a reconciliation took place, which was ratified by religious rites (Gen. xviii, 1 sq.). B.C. 1658. It has been suggested that Zipporah was the Cushite (A. V. "Ethiopian") wife who furnished Miriam and Aaron with the pretext for their attack on Moses (Numb. xii, 1, etc.). A slight confirmation for this appears to be that in a passage of Habakkuk (iii, 7) the names of Cushan and Midian are mentioned together. Another suggestion is that of Ewald (Gesch. ii, 229, note), namely, that the Cushite was a second wife, or a concubine, taken by Moses during the march through the wilderness—whether after the death of Zipporah (which is not mentioned) or from other circumstances must be uncertain. See MOSES.

Ziz (Heb. with the art. hats-Tsits, צִיץ, the profection; Sept. 'Ασσις v. r. 'Ασσις; Vulg. Sis), the name of a cliff (צִיץ, ascent) or pass by which the band of Moabites, Ammonites, and Meunim who attacked Jehoshaphat made their way up from the shores of the Dead Sea to the wilderness of Judah near Tekoa (2 Chron. xx, 16; comp. ver. 20). There can be very little doubt that it was the pass of Ain Jidy—"the very same route," as Robinson remarks, "which is taken by the Arabs in their marauding expeditions at the present day; along the shore as far as to Ain Jidy, and then up the pass, and so northward below Tekûa" (Bibl. Res.

i, 508, 530). The pass, although exceedingly precipitous, is still a great thoroughfare (Tristram, Land of Moab, p. 41). The name haz-Ziz may perhaps be still traceable in el-Husâsah, which is attached to a large tract of table-land lying immediately above the pass of Ain Jidy, between it and Tekûa, and bounded on the north by a wady of the same name (Bibl. Res. i, 527). Lieut. Conder remarks that there is a ruin called Khirbet 'Aziz south of Yutta (Quar. Statement of the "Palest. Explor. Fund." Jan. 1875, p. 15).

Zi'za (Heb. Ziza', צִיזָא, abundance [Gesen.] or shining [Fürst]; Sept. Zizá or Zovzá), the name of two men. See also ZIZAH.

1. Third named of the four sons of Rehoboam by Maachah the granddaughter of Absalom (2 Chron. xi, 20). B.C. post 973.

2. Son of Shiphi and one of the chiefs of the Simeonites, who in the reign of Hezekiah made a raid upon the peaceable Hamite shepherds of Gedor and smote them, "because there was pasture there for their flocks" (1 Chron. iv, 37). B.C. cir. 725.

Zi'zah (Heb. Zizah', צִיזָה, i. q. Ziza; Sept. Zizá; Vulg. Ziza), a Gershonite Levite, second son of Shimeï (1 Chron. xxiii, 11); elsewhere (ver. 10) called ZINA (q. v.).

Zizanion. See TARE.

Zju-gwats (or Zju-gen), in Japanese mythology, is the New-year festival, which takes place on the first day of the first month (February).

Zlata Baba, in Slavonic mythology, was a goddess worshipped by the Poles, whose golden statue (whence her name, golden woman) is said to have stood in a temple on the Obi River. Many sacrifices were made to her because she announced oracles to those desiring them.

Zlebog [pron. Zliebog], in Slavonic mythology, is the supreme evil deity, and at the same time a surname of all evil black deities, as the reverse of Dobri-bog. Czernebog is identical with Zlebog.

Znicz, in Slavonic mythology, is a deity of the Russians that was worshipped at Kiev through an eternal fire. It is thought that Znicz signifies fire. The priests of this god gave to the sick and suffering their advice in exchange for rich offerings.

Zo'an (Heb. Tso'an, זצ; Sept. Taviz; Vulg. Tania), an ancient city of Lower Egypt, situated on the eastern side of the Tanitic branch of the Nile, and mentioned several times in the Old Test. (Numb. xiii, 22; Psa. lxxviii, 12, 43; Isa. xix, 11, 13; xxx, 4; Ezek. xxx, 14). Its ruins have lately been carefully explored (Petrie, Tanis, in "Mem. of Eg. Expl. Fund," Lond. 1884-8).

I. The name, preserved in the Coptic Jani, the Arabic San (a village still on the site), and the classical Táviz, Tanis (whence the Coptic transcription Taneos), comes from the root זצ, "he moved tents" (Isa. xxxiii, 20), cognate with זצ, "he loaded a beast of burden;" and thus signifies "a place of departure" (like Zaanannim, Josh. xix, 33, or Zaanaim, Judg. iv, 11, on a similar thoroughfare). Zoan lay near the eastern border of Lower Egypt. The sense of departure or removing, therefore, would seem not to indicate a mere resting-place of caravans, but a place of departure from a country. The Egyptian name Ha-awar or Pa-awar (Avaris, Αβαρις) means "the abode" or "house" of "going out" or "departure." Its more precise sense fixes that of the Shemitic equivalent.

II. History.—1. From Manetho.—At a remote period, between the age when the pyramids were built and that of the empire, Egypt was invaded, overrun, and subdued by the strangers known as the Shepherds, who, or at least their first race, appear to have been Arabs cognate with the Phœnicians. How they entered Egypt does not appear. After a time they made one of themselves king, a certain Salatis, who reigned at Memphis, exacting tribute of Upper and Lower Egypt, and garrisoning the fittest places with especial regard to the safety of the eastern provinces, which he foresaw the Assyrians would desire to invade. With this view, finding in the Saïte (better elsewhere Sethroite) nome, on the east of the Bubastite branch, a very fit city called Avaris, he rebuilt and very strongly walled it, garrisoning it with 240,000 men. He came hither in harvest-time (about the vernal equinox), to give corn and pay to the troops, and exercise them so as to terrify foreigners.

The position of Tanis explains the case. Like the other principal cities of this tract—Pelusium, Bubastis, and Heliopolis—it lay on the east bank of the river, towards Syria. It was thus outside a great line of defence, and afforded a protection to the cultivated lands to the east and an obstacle to an invader, while to retreat from it was always possible, so long as the Egyptians held the river. But Tanis, though doubtless fortified partly with the object of repelling an invader, was too far inland to be the frontier fortress. It was near enough to be the place of departure for caravans, perhaps was the last town in the Shepherd period, but not near enough to command the entrance of Egypt. Pelusium lay upon the great road to Palestine—it has been until lately placed too far north [see SIN].—and the plain was here narrow from north to south, so that no invader could safely pass the fortress; but it soon became broader, and, by turning in a south-westerly direction, an advancing enemy would leave Tanis far to the northward, and a bold general would detach a force to keep its garrison in check and march upon Heliopolis and Memphis. An enormous standing militia, settled in the Bucolia, as the Egyptian militia afterwards was in neighboring tracts of the delta, and with its headquarters at Tanis, would have overawed Egypt, and secured a retreat in case of disaster, besides maintaining hold of some of the most productive land in the country, and mainly for the former two objects we believe Avaris to have been fortified.

2. From the Egyptian Monuments.—Apipi, probably Apophis of the fifteenth dynasty, a Shepherd-king who reigned shortly before the eighteenth dynasty, built a temple here to Set, the Egyptian Baal, and worshipped no other god. According to Manetho, the Shepherds, after 511 years of rule, were expelled from all Egypt and shut up in Avaris, whence they were allowed to depart by capitulation by either Amosis or Thummosis (Aahmes or Thothmes IV), the first and seventh kings of the eighteenth dynasty. The monuments show that the honor of ridding Egypt of the Shepherds belongs to Aahmes. Rameses II embellished the great temple of Tanis, and was followed by his son Menptah.

After the fall of the empire, the first dynasty is the twenty-first, called by Manetho that of Tanites. Its history is obscure, and it fell before the stronger line of Bubastites, the twenty-second dynasty, founded by Shishak. The expulsion of Set from the pantheon, under the twenty-second dynasty, must have been a blow to Tanis, and perhaps a religious war occasioned the rise of the twenty-third. The twenty-third dynasty is called Tanite, and its last king is probably Sethos, the contemporary of Tirhakah, mentioned by Herodotus. See EGYPT.

3. From the Bible we learn that Zoan was one of the oldest cities in Egypt, having been built seven years after Hebron, which already existed in the time of Abraham (Numb. xiii, 22; comp. Gen. xxii, 2). It seems also to have been one of the principal capitals, or royal abodes, of the Pharaohs (Isa. xix, 11, 13); and accordingly "the field of Zoan," or the fine alluvial plain around the city, is described as the scene of the marvelous works which God wrought in the time of Moses (Psa. lxxviii, 12, 33). Tanis once more appears in sacred history as a place to which came ambassadors, either of Hoshea or Ahaz, or else possibly Hezekiah: "For his princes were at Zoan, and his messengers came to Hanes" (Isa. xxx, 4). As mentioned with the frontier town Tahpanhes, Tanis is not necessarily the capital. But the same prophet perhaps more distinctly points to a Tanite line when saying, in "the burden of Egypt," "The princes of Zoan are become fools; the princes of Noph are deceived" (xix, 13). The doom of Tanis is foretold by Ezekiel: "I will set fire in Zoan" (Ezek. xxx, 14), where it occurs among the cities to be taken by Nebuchadnezzar.

III. Description and Remains.—Anciently a rich plain extended due east as far as Pelusium, about thirty miles distant, gradually narrowing towards the east, so that in a south-easterly direction from Tanis it was not more than half this breadth. The whole of this plain, about as far south and west as Tanis, was anciently known as "the Fields" or "Plains," "the Marshes" (ῥὰ Ἐλη, Ἐλεαρχία), or "the pasture-lands" (Βουκολία). Through the subsidence of the Mediterranean coast, it is now almost covered by the great lake Menzaleh. Of old it was a rich marsh-land, watered by four of the seven branches of the Nile, the Pathmitic, Mendesian, Tanitic, and Pelusiac, and swept by the cool breezes of the Mediterranean.

At present "the plain of San is very extensive, but thinly inhabited; no village exists in the immediate vicinity of the ancient Tanis; and, when looking from the mounds of this once splendid city towards the distant palms of indistinct villages, we perceive the desolation spread around it. The 'field' of Zoan is now a barren waste; a canal passes through it without being able to fertilize the soil; 'fire' has been set in 'Zoan'; and one of the principal capitals or royal abodes of the Pharaohs is now the habitation of fishermen, the resort of wild beasts, and infested with reptiles and malignant fevers." It is "remarkable for the height and extent of its mounds, which are upwards of a mile from north to south, and nearly three quarters of a mile from east to west. The area in which the sacred enclosure of the temple stood is about 1500 feet by 1250, surrounded by mounds of fallen houses. The temple was adorned by Rameses II with numerous obelisks and most of its sculptures. It is very ruinous, but its remains prove its former grandeur. The number of its obelisks, ten or twelve, all now fallen, is unequalled, and the labor of transporting them from Syene shows the lavish magnificence of the Egyptian kings. The oldest name found here is that of Sesertesen III of the twelfth dynasty, the latest that of Tirhakah" (Wilkinson, Handbook, p. 221, 222). Two black statues and a granite sphinx, with blocks of hewn and occasionally sculptured granite, are among the objects which engage the attention of the few travellers who visit this desolate place. The modern village of San consists of mere huts, with the exception of a ruined kasr of modern date (id. Modern Egypt, i, 449-452; Narrative of the Scottish Deputation, p. 72-76). Recently M. Mariette has made excavations on this site and discovered remains of the Shepherd period, showing a markedly characteristic style, especially in the representation of face and figure, but of Egyptian art, and therefore afterwards appropriated by the Egyptian kings. The bilingual or rather trilingual inscription of Ptolemy III (Euergetes I) is of very great interest. See Lepsius, Das bilingue Decret von Kanopus (Bel. 1867); Reinisch und Rösler, Die zweisprachige Inschrift von Tanis (Vienna, ed.); Proceedings of the Amer. Oriental Society, May, 1870, p. viii; Bibliotheca Sacra, xxiv, 771; xxvi, 581.

Zo'ar (Heb. Tso'ar, צֹרַר [fully צֹרְרָה, Gen. xix, 22, 23, 30], smallness; Sept. Ζηγώρ, Ζογώρ, or Ζόγορα; Josephus Ζωώρ, ῥὰ Ζόαρα or Ζωαρα; Vulg. Segor), one of the cities of the Jordan and Dead-Sea valley, and apparently, from the way in which it is mentioned, the most distant from the western highlands of Palestine (xiii, 10). Its original name was BELA, and it was still so called at the time of Abram's first residence in Canaan (xiv, 2, 8). It was then in intimate connection with the cities of the "plain of Jordan"—Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboiim (see also xiii, 10; but not x, 19)—and its king took part with the kings of those towns in the battle with the Assyrian host which ended in their defeat and the capture of Lot. The change is thus explained in the narrative of Lot's escape from Sodom. When urged by the angel to flee to the mountain, he pointed to Bela, and said, "This city is near to flee unto, and it is a little one" (צֹרַר). Oh, let me escape thither (is it not a little one?) and my soul shall live." The angel consented; and the incident proved a new baptism to the place—"Therefore the name of the city was called Zoar," that is, "little" (v, 22). This incident further tends to fix its site, at least relatively to Sodom. It must have been nearer than the mountains, and yet outside the boundary of the plain or vale of Siddim, which was destroyed during the conflagration. It would seem from ver. 30 that it lay at the foot of the mountain into which Lot subsequently went up, and where he dwelt. That mountain was most probably the western declivity of Moab, overlooking the Dead Sea. In Deut. xxxiv, 3 there is another slight indication of the position of Zoar. From the top of Pisgah Moses obtained his view of the Promised Land. The east, the north, and the west he viewed, and lastly "the south, and the plain of the valley of Jericho, unto Zoar." This is not quite definite; but, considering the scope of the passage, it may be safely concluded that the general basin of the Dead Sea is meant, and that Zoar was near its southern end. Isaiah reckons Zoar among the cities of Moab, but does not describe its position. It would seem, however, from the way in which it is mentioned, that it must have been on the utmost border (Isa. xv, 5). Jeremiah is the only other sacred writer who mentions it, and his words are less definite than those of Isaiah (Jer. xlviii, 34).

In early Christian times Josephus says that it retained its name (Ζωώρ) to his day (Ant. i, 11, 4), that it was at the farther end of the Asphaltic Lake, in Arabia—by which he means the country lying southeast of the lake, whose capital was Petra (War, iv, 8, 4; Ant. xiv, 1, 4). The notices of Eusebius are to the same tenor: the Dead Sea extended from Jericho to Zoar (Ζοορών; Onomast. s. v. Θάλασσα ἡ ἄλυκη). Phæno lay between Petra and Zoar (ibid. s. v. Φινών). It still retained its name (Ζωαρά), lay close to (παρὰκειμένη) the Dead Sea, was crowded with inhabitants, and contained a garrison of Roman soldiers; the palm and the balsam still flourished, and testified to its ancient fertility (ibid. s. v. Βαλά). To these notices of Eusebius, Jerome adds little or nothing. Paula, in her journey, beholds Segor (which Jerome gives on several occasions as the Hebrew form of the name, in opposition to Zoara, or Zoara, the Syrian form) from Caphar Barucha (possibly Beni Naim, near Hebron), at the same time with Engedi, and the land where once stood the four cities; but the terms of the statement are too vague to allow of any inference as to its position (Epist. cviii, § 11). In his commentary on Isa. xv, 5, Jerome says that it was "in the boundary of the Moabites, dividing them from the land of the Philistines," and thus justifies his use of the word vecis to translate בְּרִיחוֹת (A. V. "his fugitives," marg. "borders;" Gesen. Flüchtlinge). The terra Philisthiim, unless the words are corrupt, can only mean the land of Palestine—i. e. (according to the inaccurate usage of later times) of Israel—as opposed to Moab. In his Questiones Hebraicae, on Gen. xix, 30 (comp. xiv, 3), Jerome goes so far as to affirm the accuracy of the Jewish conjecture, that the later name of Zoar was Shalish-sha—"Bale primum et postea Salisa appellata" (comp. also his comment on Isa. xv, 5). But this is probably grounded merely on an interpretation of shalishiyeh in Isa. xv, 5, as connected with bela, and as denoting the "third" destruction of the town by "earthquakes."

Zoar was included in the province of Palestina Tertia, which contained also Kerak and Areopolis. It was an episcopal see, in the patriarchate of Jerusalem and archbishopric of Petra; at the Council of Chalcedon (A. D. 451) it was represented by its bishop, Musonius, and at the Synod of Constantinople (A. D. 586) by John (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. iii, 743-746).

Among the statements of mediæval travellers there are two remarkable ones. (1.) Brocardus (cir. A. D. 1290), the author of the Descriptio Terræ Sanctæ, the standard "Handbook to Palestine" of the Middle Ages, the work of an able and intelligent resident in the country, states (c. vii) that "five leagues (leuce) to the south of Jericho is the city Segor, situated beneath the mountain of Engaddi, between which mountain and the Dead Sea is the statue of salt." True, he confesses that all his efforts to visit the spot had been frustrated by the Saracens; but the passage bears marks of the greatest desire to obtain correct information, and he must have nearly approached the place, because he saw with his own eyes the "pyramids" which covered the "wells of bitumen," which he supposes to have been those of the vale of Siddim. This is in curious agreement with the connection between Engedi and Zoar implied in Jerome's Itinerary of Paula. (2). The statement of Thietmar (A.D. 1217) is even more singular. It is contained in the 11th and 12th chapters of his Peregrinatio (ed. Laurent, Hamburg, 1857). After visiting Jericho and Gilgal, he arrives at the "fords of Jordan" (xi, 20), where Israel crossed and where Christ was baptized, and where then, as now, the pilgrims bathed (22). Crossing this ford (33), he arrives at "the field and the spot where the Lord overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah." After a description of the lake come the following words: "On the shore of this lake, about a mile (ad miliare) from the spot at which Lot's wife was turned" (47). "Hence I came from the lake of Sodom and Gomorrah, and arrived at Segor, where Lot took refuge after the overthrow of Sodom; which is now called in the Syrian tongue Zora, but in Latin the City of Palms. In the mountain hard by this Lot sinned with his daughters (xii, 1-3). After this I passed the vineyard of Benjamin (?) and of Engaddi. . . . Next I came into the land of Moab and to the mountain in which was the cave where David hid, . . . leaving on my left hand Sethim (Shittim), where the children of Israel tarried. . . . At last I came to the plains of Moab, which abound in cattle and grain. . . . A plain country, delightfully covered with herbage, but without either woods or single trees; hardly even a twig or shrub (4-15). . . . After this I came to the torrent Jabbok" (xiv, 1).

Zoar is very distinctly mentioned by the Crusading historians. Fulcher (Gesta Dei, p. 405, quoted by Raumer, p. 239) states that, "having encircled (girato) the southern part of the lake on the road from Hebron to Petra, we found there a large village which was said to be Segor, in a charming situation, and abounding with dates. Here we began to enter the mountains of Arabia." The palms are mentioned also by William of Tyre (xxii, 80) as being so abundant as to cause the place to be called Villa Palmarum, and Palmer (i. e. probably Paumier). Abulfeda (cir. A.D. 1820) does not specify its position more nearly than that it was adjacent to the lake and the Ghôr, but he testifies to its then importance by calling the lake after it—Bahretzegehôr (see, too, Ibn-Idris, in Reland, p. 272). The natural inference from the description of Fulcher is that Segor lay in the Wady Kerak, the ordinary road, then and now, from the south of the Dead Sea to the eastern highlands. The conjecture of Irbý and Mangles (June 1, and see May 9), that the extensive ruins which they found in the lower part of this Wady were those of Zoar, is therefore probably accurate. The name Dra'a or Dera'ah, which they, Poole (Geogr. Journ. xxvi, 63), and Burckhardt (July 15), give to the valley, may even without violence be accepted as a corruption of Zoar. The ruins have likewise been described by De Saulcy (Journey, i, 807).

M. de Saulcy himself, however, places Zoar in the Wady Zuweirah, the pass leading from Hebron to the Dead Sea. But the names Zuweirah and Zoar are not nearly so similar in the originals as they are in their Western forms, and there is the fatal obstacle to the proposal that it places Zoar on the west of the lake, away from what appears to have been the original cradle of Moab and Ammon. If we are to look for Zoar in this neighborhood, it would surely be better to place it at the Tell um-Zoghah, the latter part of which name is almost literally the same as the Hebrew Zoar. The proximity of this name and that of Udum, so like Sodom, and the presence of the salt mountain—to this day splitting off in pillars which show a rude resemblance to the human form—are certainly remarkable facts. Other writers locate Zoar in the plain at the northern end of the Dead Sea. An insuperable objection to this is that in that case Lot must have crossed the Jordan in his flight; for Sodom was on the west side of the plain, and Zoar on the east. Mr. Birch (in the Quarterly Statement of the "Palest. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1879, p. 15 sq.) is confident that the name and site are those of Tell es-Shagûr, at the foot of Wady Hesbân; but his arguments lack weight. Tristram's attempt (Land of Moab, p. 343) to identify Zoar with Ziara on Mount Nebo is based upon an error as to the latter name, which is properly Siaghuk; the position on a mountain, moreover, is preposterous. For the different views held regarding the site of Zoar, see Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii, 517; Reland, Palæst. p. 1064; De Saulcy, Travels, i, 481; Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 360; Bibliotheca Sacra, 1868, p. 136 sq. See SODOM.

Zoarites. See SEPARATISTS OF ZOAR.

Zo'ba (Heb. Tsoba', צוֹבָה, 2 Sam. x, 6, 8) or Zo'-bah (Heb. Tsobah', צוֹבָה [briefly צוֹבָה, 2 Sam. xxiii, 86], station; Sept. Σώβα v. r. Σωβά, etc.; Vulg. usually Soba), the name of a portion of Aram or Syria, which formed a separate kingdom in the time of the Jewish monarchs Saul, David, and Solomon. It is difficult to fix its exact position and limits; but there seem to be grounds for regarding it as lying chiefly eastward of Cœle-Syria, and extending thence north-east and east towards, if not even to, the Euphrates (see 1 Chron. xviii, 8-9; xix, 6). It would thus have included the eastern flank of the mountain chain which shuts in Cœle-Syria on that side, the high land about Aleppo, and the more northern portion of the Syrian desert. The Syriac interpreters take Zobah to be Nisibis, in Mesopotamia, and they have been followed by Michaelis (De Syria Sobæa, in the Comment. Soc. Gotting. p. 57 sq.). Others would identify it with the classic Chalcis. It was so closely connected with Hamath that that great city was sometimes distinguished as Hamath-zobah (2 Chron. viii, 8). Among the cities of Zobah were also a place called Tibhath or Betah (2 Sam. viii, 8; 1 Chron. xviii, 8), which is, perhaps, Tai-beh, between Palmyra and Aleppo; and another called Berothai, which has been supposed to be Beirût, but with little probability, for the kingdom of Hamath must have intervened between Zobah and the coast. See BEROthAH. Zobah was a wide, arid plain intersected by several ranges of bare, white mountains, but having also a few fertile valleys. The inhabitants were probably semi-nomads, and chiefly shepherds. Like the modern Bedawin of that region, they were rich in horses (Ritter, Pal. und Syr. iv, 1700; Porter, Handbook for Pal. p. 614). See SYRIA.

We first hear of Zobah in the time of Saul, when we find it mentioned as a separate country, governed apparently by a number of kings who own no common head or chief (1 Sam. xiv, 47). Saul engaged in war with these kings and "vexed them," as he did his other neighbors. Some forty years later than this we find Zobah under a single ruler, Hadadezer, son of Rehob, who seems to have been a powerful sovereign. He had wars with Toi, king of Hamath (2 Sam. viii, 10), while he lived in close relations of amity with the kings of Damascus, Beth-rehob, Ish-tob, etc., and held various petty Syrian princes as vassals under his yoke (x, 19). He had even considerable influence in Mesopotamia, beyond the Euphrates, and was able on one occasion to obtain an important auxiliary force from that quarter (ver. 16; comp. title to Psa. lx). David, having resolved to take full possession of the tract of territory originally promised to the posterity of Abraham (2 Sam. viii, 3; comp. Gen. xv, 18), attacked Hadadezer in the early part of his reign, defeated his army, and took from him a thousand chariots, seven hundred (seven thousand, 1 Chron. xviii, 4) horsemen, and twenty thousand footmen. Hadadezer's allies, the Syrians of Damascus, having marched to his assistance, David defeated them in a great battle, in which they lost twenty-two thousand men. The wealth of Zobah is very apparent in the narrative of this campaign. Several of the officers of Hadadezer's army carried "shields of gold" (2 Sam. viii, 7), by which we are probably to understand iron or wooden frames overlaid with plates of the precious metal. The cities, moreover, which David took, Betah (or Tibbath) and Berothai, yielded him "exceeding much brass" (ver. 8). It is not clear whether the Syrians of Zobah submitted and became tributary on this occasion, or whether, although defeated, they were able to maintain their independence. At any rate, a few years later they were again in arms against David. This time the Jewish king acted on the defensive. The war was provoked by the Ammonites, who hired the services of the Syrians of Zobah among others to help them against the people of Israel, and obtained in this way auxiliaries to the amount of thirty-three thousand men. The allies were defeated in a great battle by Joab, who engaged the Syrians in person with the flower of his troops (x, 9). Hadadezer, upon this, made a last effort. He sent across the Euphrates into Mesopotamia and "drew forth the Syrians that were beyond the river" (1 Chron. xix, 16), who had hitherto taken no part in the war. With these allies and his own troops, he once more renewed the struggle with the Israelites, who were now commanded by David himself, the crisis being such as seemed to demand the presence of the king. A battle was fought near Helam—a place the situation of which is uncertain—where the Syrians of Zobah and their new allies were defeated with great slaughter, losing between forty thousand and fifty thousand men. After this we hear of no more hostilities. The petty princes hitherto tributary to Hadadezer transferred their allegiance to the king of Israel, and it is probable that he himself became a vassal to David. Zobah, however, though subdued, continued to cause trouble to the Jewish kings. A man of Zobah, one of the subjects of Hadadezer—Rezon, son of Eliadah—having escaped from the battle of Helam and "gathered a band" (i. e. a body of irregular marauders), marched southward, and contrived to make himself master of Damascus, where he reigned (apparently) for some fifty years, proving a fierce adversary to Israel all through the reign of Solomon (1 Kings xi, 23–25). Solomon also was (it would seem) engaged in a war with Zobah itself. The Hamath-zobah against which he "went up" (2 Chron. viii, 3) was probably a town in that country which resisted his authority, and which he accordingly attacked and subdued. This is the last that we hear of Zobah in Scripture. The name, however, is found at a later date in the inscriptions of Assyria, where the kingdom of Zobah seems to intervene between Hamath and Damascus, falling thus into the regular line of march of the Assyrian armies. Several Assyrian monarchs relate that they took tribute from Zobah, while others speak of having traversed it on their way to or from Palestine.

Zobe'bah (Heb. with the article, hats-Tsobebah, הַצֹּבְבָה, the slow [Gesenius] or affable [Furst]; Sept. Σαββα v. r. Σαβαζά; Vulg. Sobeba), last named of the two sons (or perhaps a daughter, as the word is feminine) of Cōz (q. v.) of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 8). B.C. post 1618. Rabbi Schwarz regards it as the name of a town, "the village Beth-zaphapha, two and a half English miles south of Jerusalem" (Palest. p. 116).

Zo'har (Heb. Tso'char, צֹחַר, light; Sept. Σαάρ), the name of two or three men.

1. The father of Ephron the Hittite, from which latter Abraham purchased the cave of Machpelah (Gen. xxiii, 8; xxv, 9). B.C. ante 2026.

2. Last named but one of the six sons of Simeon (Gen. xlii, 10; Exod. vi, 15); elsewhere (1 Chron. iv, 24) called ZERAH (q. v.).

3. A marginal reading in 1 Chron. iv, 7 for JEZOAR (Heb. rather Yischar, יִשָּׁר, which [as usual] takes the pointing of the Keri צֹחַר, and Zohar; the A. V. of 1611 has "Zoar"), second named of the three sons of Helah of the tribe of Judah. B.C. post 1618.

Zo'heleth (Heb. with the art. haz-Zoche'leth הַצֹּחֶלֶת, a fem. participial form; Sept. Ζωηλεθ v. r. Ζωηλεθ; Vulg. Zoheleth), the name of a stone (צֶחֶל) which was "by" (בְּצֶחֶל, beside) En-rogel, and "by" (בְּצֶחֶל, along with) which Adonijah offered his coronation sacrifices (1 Kings i, 9). If En-rogel be the present Bir-Eyûb in the valley of the Kidron, the stone in question may be any of the boulders in that vicinity.

As to the signification of the name, the Targumists translate it "the rolling stone," and Jarchi affirms that it was a large stone on which the young men tried their strength in attempting to roll it. Others make it "the serpent stone" (Gesenius and Furst), as if from the root צֶחֶל, "to creep." Jerome simply says, "Zoelet tractum sive protractum." Others connect it with running water; but there is nothing strained in making it "the stone of the conduit" (צֶחֶל, Mazchilah), from its proximity to the great rock conduit or conduits that poured into Siloam. Bochart's idea is that the Hebrew word zôhel denotes "a slow motion" (Hieroz. I, i, 9): "The fullers here pressing out the water which dropped from the clothes that they had washed in the well called Rogel." If this be the case, then we have some relics of this ancient custom at the massive breastwork below the present Birket el-Hamra, where the donkeys wait for their load of skins from the well, and where the Arab washerwomen may be seen to this day beating their clothes.

The practice of placing stones, and naming them from a person or an event, is very common. Jacob did so at Bethel (Gen. xxviii, 22; xxxv, 14; see Bochart, Canaan, p. 785, 786); and he did it again when parting from Laban (Gen. xxxi, 45). Joshua set up stones in Jordan and Gilgal, at the command of God (Josh. iv, 9–20), and again in Shechem (xxiv, 26). Near Bethshehem there was the Ēben-gedolâh ("great stone," 1 Sam. vi, 14), called also Ābēl-gedolâh ("the great weeping," ver. 18). There was the Ēben-Bohân, south of Jericho, in the plains of Jordan (Josh. xv, 6; xviii, 17), "the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben," the Ehrenbreitstein of the Ciccar, or "plain," of Jordan, a memorial of the son or grandson of Jacob's eldest-born, for which travellers have looked in vain, but which Felix Fabri, in the 15th century (Evagat. ii, 82), professes to have seen. The rabbins preserve the memory of this stone in a book called Ēben-Bohan, or the touchstone (Chron. of Rabbi Joseph, transl. by Bialloblotzky, i, 192). There was the stone set up by Samuel between Mizpeh and Sheu, Ēben-Ēzer, "the stone of help" (1 Sam. vii, 11, 12). There was the Great Stone on which Samuel slew the sacrifices, after the great battle of Saul with the Philistines (xiv, 33). There was the Ēben-Ēzel ("lapis discessus vel abitus, a discessu Jonathanis et Davidis" [Simonis, Onomast. p. 156]), where David hid himself, and which some Talmudists identify with Zoheleth. Large stones have always obtained for themselves peculiar names, from their shape, their position, their connection with a person or an event. In the Sinaitic desert may be found the Hajar el-Rekab ("stone of the rider"), Hajar el-Ful ("stone of the bean"), Hajar Musa ("stone of Moses"). The subject of stones is by no means uninteresting, and has not in any respect been exhausted. (See the notes of De Sola and Lindenthal in their edition of Genesis, p. 175, 226; Bochart, Canaan, p. 785; Vossius, De Idololatri. vi, 38; Scaliger, On Eusebium, p. 198; Heraldus, On Arnobius, bk. vii; and Elmenhorstius, On Arnobius; also a long note of Ouzellius, in his edition of Mitnucius Felix, p. 15; Calmet, Fragments, Nos. 166, 735, 736; Kitto, Palestine. See, besides, the works of antiquaries on stones and stone circles; and an interesting account of the curious Phœnician Hajar Chem in Malta, in Tallack's recent volume on that island, p. 115-127). See STONE.

M. Clermont Ganneau, of the French consulate at Jerusalem, has found what he deems a strong confirmation of the name in question in ez-Zehuele, a rocky plateau along the edge of the village of Silwân (Quar. Statement of the "Palest. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1871, p. 252 sq.). This is adopted by Tristram (Bible Places, p. 124) and Lieut. Conder (Tent Work, ii, 313). The boundary-line of Judah passed near this. See TRIBE.

Zo'heth (Heb. Zocheth, צֹחֶת, strong [Fürst]; Sept. Ζωχάθ v. r. Ζωάν; Vulg. Zoheth), first named of the two "sons of Ishi" of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 20), the other being called Ben-zoheth (q. v.). B.C. post 1618.

Zollikofer, GEORG JOACHIM, a famous preacher of Leipsic, was born at Saint Gall, Aug. 5, 1730. He attended the gymnasia of Saint Gall and Bremen, and afterwards the University of Utrecht; giving attention rather to literature than theology at the latter place, and cultivating a finished diction. He became a family tutor at Frankfort-on-the-Main in 1749. In 1753 he returned to Saint Gall, and vainly sought employment there and in other Swiss towns; but earned, in the meantime, a reputation which obtained for him a call to become the pastor of the Reformed congregation at Leipsic. He served that congregation during thirty years, and until his death, which occurred Jan. 22, 1788.

Zollikofer's tendency was in some measure in harmony with the spirit of his times. He was given to the exaltation of virtue, and loved to discuss the dignity of man, the ways of righteousness which alone lead to God, and which Jesus opened by teaching and example. He asserted that persons who have always been virtuous need no conversion, but simply a perfecting of their characters. Christianity was to him God's own best means for the instructing, comforting, and improving of men, through which progress they may attain to blessedness. He was not, however, an exponent of the "enlightenment" of that period; for Christ's resurrection, ascension, and eternal glory were held by him as positive facts. Christ was to him the only-begotten Son of the Highest, though the atonement was regarded as simply an expression of God's readiness to forgive. As a preacher, he may be ranked with Reinhard, though superior to him as an expositor and in the definite aim of his discourse, as well as in the joyous fervor with which it was usually pervaded. Leipsic regarded it as an evidence of inferior culture and poor taste not to prefer him above the contemporary preachers. He wrote prayers which are mere reflections preceded by an address to God; e. g. Anreden u. Gebete bei dem gemeinschaftl. u. häuslichen Gottesdienste (1777):—Andachtsübungen u. Gebete, etc. (new ed. 1804, 4 pts.). He also prepared a hymn-book, Sammlung geistl. Lieder u. Gesänge (1766). His sermons were repeatedly published; in 15 vols. in 1798-1804. His personal character was thoroughly upright and manly, and also kindly and benevolent. He was self-possessed and of an equitable temper. The care with which he chose the precise word he needed made him eloquent in the pulpit, but reticent in ordinary intercourse with men.

Handbuch* (Ernesti's supplement, Leips. 1815), xvii, 272 sq.; Döring, Deutsche Kanzelredner d. 18. u. 19. Jahrhunderts (Neustadt an d. Zo'phah (Heb. Tsophach, צֹפַח, [in pause צֹפָח], a cruse [Gesen.]; Sept. Ζωφά v. r. Ζωφάρ and Ζωχάθ; Vulg. Supha), an Asherite, first named of the four sons of Helam or Hotham (1 Chron. vii, 35; comp. ver. 32), and father of many sons (ver. 36). B.C. cir. 1618.

Zo'phai (Heb. Tsophay, צֹפַי, patronymic from Zuph [Fürst]; Sept. Ζουφί; Vulg. Sophat), a Kohathite Levite, son of Elkanah and father of Nahath (1 Chron. vi, 26 [Heb. 11]); elsewhere (ver. 35) called simply ΖΟΥΡ (q. v.).

Zo'phar (Heb. Tsophar, צֹפָר, sparrow [Gesen.] or shaggy [Fürst]; Sept. Ζωφά; Vulg. Sophar), the last named of Job's three friends and opponents in argument (Job ii, 11; xi, 1; xx, 1; xlii, 9). B.C. cir. 2000. He is called a Naamathite, or inhabitant of Naamah, a place whose situation is unknown, as it could not be the Naamah mentioned in Josh. xv, 41. Wemyss, in his Job and his Times (p. 111), well characterizes this interlocutor: "Zophar exceeds the other two, if possible, in the severity of censure; he is the most inveterate of the accusers, and speaks without feeling or pity. He does little more than repeat and exaggerate the arguments of Bildad. He unfeelingly alludes (Job xi, 15) to the effects of Job's disease as appearing in his countenance. This is cruel and invidious. Yet in the same discourse how nobly does he treat of the divine attributes, showing that any inquiry into them is far beyond the grasp of the human mind! And though the hortatory part of the first discourse bears some resemblance to that of Eliphaz, yet it is diversified by the fine imagery which he employs. He seems to have had a full conviction of the providence of God as regulating and controlling the actions of men; but he limits all his reasonings to the present life, and makes no reference to a future world. This circumstance alone accounts for the weakness and fallacy of these men's judgments. In his second discourse there is much poetical beauty in the selection of images, and the general doctrine is founded in truth; its fallacy lies in its application to Job's peculiar case. The whole indicates great warmth of temper, inflamed by misapprehension of its object and by mistaken zeal." It is to be observed that Zophar has but two speeches, whereas the others have three each. When Job had replied (ch. xxvi-xxxi) to the short address of Bildad (ch. xxv), a rejoinder might have been expected from Zophar; but he said nothing, the three friends, by common consent, then giving up the contest in despair (xxxii, 1). See JOB.

Zo'phim (Heb. Tsophim, צֹפִים, [briefly צִים in Numb.], watchers, as often; but First thinks, fertile), the name either in whole or part of two places in Palestine.

1. (Sept. σκοπῖαν; Vulg. sublimis.) The designation of a field (צֹפִי) or spot on or near the top of Pisgah, from which Balaam had his second view of the encampment of Israel (Numb. xxiii, 14). If the word sudêh ("field") may be taken in its usual sense, then the "field of Zophim" was a cultivated spot high up on the top of the range of Pisgah. But that word is the almost invariable term for a portion of the upper district of Moab, and therefore may have had some local sense which has hitherto escaped notice, and in which it is employed in reference to the spot in question. The position of the field of Zophim is not defined; it is only said that it commanded merely a portion of the encampment of Israel. Neither do the ancient versions afford any clew. The Targum of Onkelos, the Sept., and the Peshito-Syriac take Zophim in the sense of "watchers" or "lookers-out," and translate it accordingly. But it is probably a Hebrew version of an aboriginal name, related to that which, in other places of the present records, appears as Mizpeh or Mizpah. Mount Nebo, or Pisgah, is now undoubtedly identified as Jebel Neba, near Hesbân. See NEBO. De Saulcy appears to have even heard the ancient name given to it by the Bedawin (Voyage en Terre Sainte, i, 289). Along its eastern side, and reaching from the ruins of Maan to Hesbân, is a plateau of arable land, still cultivated in part by the Arabs, which appears to be the place in question (Porter, Handbook for Palestine, p. 300). In this view Tristram at length concurs (Bible Places, p. 846). Prof. Paine, of the American Exploring Party, regards it as Wady Huiaa, on the south-east of Jebel Neba. See PISGAH.

2. (Sept. Σωφίμ v. r. Σιφά; Vulg. Sophim.) Ramathaim-zophim was Samuel's birthplace (1 Sam. i, 1). The dual form of the first term, according to some, signifies one of the two Ramahs: to wit, that of the Zophites (Lightfoot, ii, 162, ed. 1832); and the second term, according to others, means sneclatores, i. e. prophets, and denoting that at this place was a school of the prophets—a hypothesis supported by the Chaldee paraphrast, who renders it "Elkanah, a man of Ramatha, a disciple of the prophets." Others find in the dual form of Ramathaim a reference to the shape of the city, which was built on the sides of two hills; and in the word Zophim see an allusion to some watch-towers, or places of observation, which the high situation of the city might favor (Clerici Opera, ii, 175). Others, again, affirm that the word Zophim is added because Ramah or Ramatha was inhabited by a clan of Levites of the family of Zuph (Calmet, s. v.). Winer asserts (Reinwört. art. "Samuel") that the first verse of the book declares Samuel to be an Ephraimite. This term, however, if the genealogy in Chronicles remain undisturbed, must signify not an Ephraimite by birth, but by abode. We find that the Kohathites, to whom Samuel belonged, had their lot in Mount Ephraim (Josh. xxi, 5-20), where not the hill of Ephraim is meant, but the hill country of Ephraim (Gesenius, Thesaur. s. v.). The family of Zoph, living in the hill country of Ephraim, might be termed Ephrathite, while their ancestor's name distinguished their special locality as Ramathaim-zophim. The geography of this place has been disputed. See RAMAH. Eusebius and Jerome confound it with Arimathæa of the New Test. (Onomast. art. "Arimathæa Sophim"). The Sept. renders it Ἀρμαθίμ Σωφίμ, Cod. A, or Cod. B, Ἀρμαθίμ Σιφά. For an account of the place now, and for long called Neby Samwil, and the impossibility of its being the ancient Ramah, see Robinson, Palestine, ii, 141; and for an interesting discussion as to the site of Ramath-zophim, the latter name being yet retained in the Arabic term Sôbah, the curious reader may consult the same work (p. 830), or Biblioth. Sacra (p. 46). The hilly range of Ephraim extended southward into other cantons, while it bore its original name of Mount Ephraim; and so the inhabitants of Ramathaim-zophim might be termed Ephrathites, just as Mahlon and Chilion are called "Ephrathites of Beth-lehem-judah" (Ruth i, 2). See RAMATHAIM; ZUPH.

Zo'rah (Heb. Tsorah', צֹרַח, hornet; Sept. Σαρά v. r. Σορά, Σαράλ, Σαρά, etc.; Josephus, Σαρά, Ant. v, 8, 12; Vulg. Sarai; A. V. "Zareah," Neh. xi, 29; "Zoreah," Josh. xv, 33), one of the towns near the border of the tribe of Dan (xix, 41), but really within the limits of Judah, being in the north-western corner of the "valley district" (xv, 33). It is almost always mentioned in connection with Eshtaul (see also Judg. xiii, 25; xvi, 31; xviii, 2, 8, 11; and comp. 1 Chron. ii, 53). Zorah was the residence of Manoah and the native place of Samson. The place both of his birth and his burial is specified with a curious minuteness as "between Zorah and Eshtaul," "in Mahaneh-Dan" (Judg. xiii, 25; xvi, 31). In the genealogical records of 1 Chron. (ii, 53; iv, 2) the "Zareathites and Eshtaulites" are given as descended from (i. e. colonized by) Kirjath-jearim. Zorah is mentioned among the places fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi, 10), and it was re-inhabited by the men of Judah after the return from the Captivity (Neh. xi, 29). In the Onomasticon (s. v. Σαρά and "Saara") it is mentioned as lying some ten miles north of Eleutheropolis on the road to Nicopolis. By the Jewish traveller Hap-Parchi (Zunz, Benjamin of Tud. ii, 441) it is specified as three hours south-east of Lydd. These notices agree in direction—though in neither is the distance nearly sufficient—with the modern village of Sūr'ah, which has been visited by Robinson (Bibl. Res. iii, 153) and Tobler (Dritte Wand. p. 181-183). It lies just below the brow of a sharp-pointed conical hill, at the shoulder of the ranges which there meet and form the north side of the Wady Ghurāb, the northernmost of the two branches which unite just below Sūr'ah, and form the great wady Surar. Near it are to be seen the remains of Zanoah, Bethshemesh, Timnath, and other places more or less frequently mentioned with it in the narrative. Eshtaul, however, has not yet been identified. The position of Sūr'ah at the entrance of the valley, which forms one of the inlets from the great lowland, explains its fortification by Rehoboam. The spring is a short distance below the village, "a noble fountain"—this was at the end of April—"walled up square with large hewn stones and gushing over with fine water. As we passed on," continues Robinson, with a more poetical tone than is his wont, "we overtook no less than twelve women toiling upwards to the village, each with her jar of water on her head. The village, the fountain, the fields, the mountain, the females bearing water, all transported us back to ancient times, when in all probability the mother of Samson often in like manner visited the fountain and toiled homeward with her jar of water." See also Schwarz, Palestine, p. 102; Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 361; Porter, Handbook for Pal. p. 285; Tristram, Bible Places, p. 46; Conder, Tent Work, i, 274.

Zo'rathite (Heb. Tsorathi', צֹרַחִי, patronymic from Zorah; Sept. Σαράδι v. r. Ἀπαδι; Vulg. Sorathi; A. V. "Zorathites"), a designation of the inhabitants of Zorah (q. v.), mentioned in 1 Chron. iv, 2 as descended from Shobal, one of the sons of Judah, who in ii, 52 is stated to have founded Kirjath-jearim, from which again "the Zareathites and the Eshtaulites" were colonized. See ZAREATHITE; ZORITE.

Zo'reah (Josh. xv, 33). See ZORAH.

Zo'rite (Heb. Tsori', צֹרִי, a patronymic; Sept. Σαρά v. r. Ἡραπί; Vulg. Sarai; A. V. "Zorites"), the designation apparently of the inhabitants of Zorah (q. v.), mentioned in 1 Chron. ii, 54 as descended from Salma the brother of Shobal, and hence classed with the descendants of the latter the "Zareathites and the Eshtaulites" (ver. 53).

Zosimus, pope in A. D. 417-418, successor to Innocent I, was by birth a Greek, and is noteworthy as a participant in the doctrinal controversies of his time, in which he first endorsed and then rejected doctrines regarded as heretical, and also for his assertion of authority and his energetic labors in behalf of the supremacy of the Roman see. He countermanded the condemnation of Pelagius and Cœlestius, denounced by Innocent and the African synods; and in a letter to bishop Aurelius of Carthage and others he censured the treatment they had received, declared them orthodox, and warned the bishops against sophistries in speculation. He also cited before his bar Paulinus, the accuser of Pelagius. The African bishops, however, held another synod (418), which defended their course and censured Zosimus for reopening a settled case, besides forbidding the departure of Paulinus for Rome. Zosimus endeavored to fortify his position by a reference to the ecclesiastical authority derived by his see from Peter; but when the Africans obtained a sacrum rescriptum against the Pelagians from the emperor Honorius, he gave way, and for his part pronounced the condemnation of Pelagius and Cœlestius in an Epistola Tractatoria. This time he was opposed by eighteen Italian bishops, whom he at once declared deposed. The deposition of the presbyter Aparius of Sicca, in Numidia, and his appeal to Zosimus against his bishop, Urbanus, led to fresh disputes with the Africans. Zosimus refused to recognise the deposition, and sent three delegates to a synod convened at Carthage to demand the restoration of Aparius.

Zosimus also interfered in the affairs of the Gallican bishops by appointing bishop Patroclus of Arelate his vicar in Gaul, and conferring upon him the rights of metropolitan over the province of Vienne. His course excited much opposition; but death put an end to his plans for aggrandizement in 418. See Schröckh, Kirchen-gesch. (Leips. 1782), viii, 148 sq.; Gieseler, Kirchen-gesch. (4th ed. Bonn. 1845), i, 2, 111 sq.—Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

Zouch, THOMAS, D.D., a learned English divine, was born at Sandal, near Wakefield, Yorkshire, in 1737. He was educated at Wakefield School and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1761. He became a fellow of his college in 1763, and was appointed assistant tutor. In 1770 he became rector of Wycliffe, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, where he remained until 1793. In 1791 he was appointed deputy commissary of the archdeaconry of Richmond, and in 1793 was chaplain to the Master of the Rolls and rector of Scrayingham. By the death of his elder brother, the Rev. Henry Zouch, in 1795, he succeeded to an estate at Sandal, where he resided until his death. He became prebendary of Durham in 1805; declined the bishopric of Carlisle in 1808; and died in 1816. He was the author of, The Crucifixion (Canterbury, 1765); a Seaton prize poem:—An Inquiry into the Prophetic Character of the Romans as Described in Dan. viii. 23-25 (1792);—Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Sir Philip Sidney (York, 1808);—and other works. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth. s. v.

Zu'ar (Heb. Tsuar, צֹאֵר, littleness; Sept. Σωπάρ; Vulg. Suar), the father of Nethaneel, which latter was the chief of the tribe of Issachar at the time of the Exode (Numb. i, 8; ii, 5; vii, 18, 23; x, 15). B.C. ante 1658.

Zubly, JOHN JOACHIM, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at St. Gall, Switzerland, Aug. 27, 1724. He was ordained to the ministry Aug. 19, 1744; took charge of the Independent Presbyterian Church of Savannah, Ga., in 1760; and was a delegate from Georgia to the Constitutional Congress in 1775-76, but opposed separation from England, and returned to Savannah, which his unpopularity forced him to leave. He died July 23, 1781. Dr. Zubly was a man of great learning and unaffected piety, devoted to his call as a preacher of the Gospel, and zealous for the success of his labors. He published, The Real Christian's Hope in Death, etc. (Charlestown, 1756, 12mo), with a Preface by the Rev. Richard Clarke;—Sermon on the Repeal of the Stamp Act (Savannah, 1766, 8vo);—An Humble Inquiry into the Nature of the Dependency of the American Colonies upon the Parliament of Great Britain, and the Right of Parliament to Lay Taxes on the said Colonies, by a Freeholder of South Carolina (1769, 4to);—Sermon on the Value of that Faith without which it is Impossible to Please God (1772);—Sermon on the Death of Rev. John Osgood, of Midway (1773);—The Law of Liberty (Phila. 1775, 8vo; Lond. eod. 8vo; Phila. 1778, 8vo), a sermon on American affairs. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 219; London Monthly Review, Feb. 1776, p. 167; Georgia Analytic Repository, i, 49. (J. L. S.)

Zuph (Heb. Tsúph, צֹפִי, honey-comb [Gesén.] or moist [Fürst]; Sept. Σούφ v. r. Σώφ and Σούπ; but in 1 Sam. ix, 5 Σίφ, apparently reading צֹפִי, Tsúph, as the text of the Heb. there does), the name of a man and of a place.

1. A Kohathite Levite, the son of Elkanah and father of Tohu, or Toah, or Nahath in the ancestry of the prophet Samuel (1 Sam. i, 1; 1 Chron. vi, 35 [Heb. 20]). B.C. cir. 1310. In the parallel passage (1 Chron. vi, 26) he is called ZOPHAH.

2. A district (צֹפִי, land) at which Saul and his servant arrived after passing through those of Shalisha, of Shalim, and of the Benjamites (1 Sam. ix, 5). It evidently contained the city in which they encountered Samuel (ver. 6), and that, again, if the conditions of the narrative are to be accepted, was certainly not far from the "tomb of Rachel," probably the spot to which that name is still attached, a short distance north of Bethlehem. The name Zuph is connected in a singular manner with Samuel. One of his ancestors (see above) was named Zuph (i, 1; 1 Chron. vi, 35) or Zophai (ver. 26), and his native place was called Ramathaim-zophim (1 Sam. i, 1). The name, too, in its various forms of Zophim, Mizpeh, Mizpah, Zephathah, was common in the Holy Land, on both sides of the Jordan.

The only possible trace of the name of Zuph in modern Palestine, in any suitable locality, is to be found in Soba, a well-known place about seven miles due west of Jerusalem, and five miles south-west of Naby Samwil. This Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Res. ii, 8, 9) once proposed as the representative of Ramathaim-zophim; and although on topographical grounds he virtually renounces the idea (see the foot-note to the same pages), yet those grounds need not similarly affect its identity with Zuph, provided other considerations do not interfere. If Shalim and Shalisha were to the north-east of Jerusalem, near Taiyibeh, then Saul's route to the land of Benjamin would be south or south-west, and pursuing the same direction he would arrive at the neighborhood of Soba. But this is at the best no more than conjecture, and unless the land of Zuph extended a good distance east of Soba, the city in which the meeting with Samuel took place could hardly be sufficiently near to Rachel's sepulchre. The signification of the name Zuph is too doubtful to be of use in identifying the place. Zophim is usually considered to signify watchmen or lookers-out, hence prophets, in which sense the author of the Targum has actually rendered 1 Sam. ix, 5—"they came into the land in which was a prophet of Jehovah." Rabbi Schwarz regards the name Zuph as having the same root (from צֹפֶה, to spy out), and thinks it denotes an eminence or look-out. He also (Palest. p. 156) ingeniously traces Saul's route, and seeks to identify "the land of Zuph" with Ramathaim-zophim itself. Wolcott (in the Biblioth. Sacra, i, 604) suggests that the city of Ziph (so the name reads in the Kethib and Sept.) gave its name to this whole region; but this town was too far south for that. It is probable that the district in question was a wide one, at least from north to south, and extended from the hills of Ephraim to the vicinity of Bethlehem. See RAMAH.

Zur (Heb. Tsúr, צֹר, a rock, being substantially the same as the Heb. name of Tyre [q. v.]; Sept. Σούρ v. r. Isoúr; Vulg. Sur), the name of two men.

1. Third named of the five princes of Midian who were slain by the Israelites when Balaam fell (Numb. xxxi, 8). B.C. 1618. His daughter Cozbi was killed by Phinehas, together with her paramour Zimri, the Simeonite chieftain (xxv, 15). He appears to have been in some way subject to Sihon king of the Amorites (Josh. xiii, 21).

2. Second named of the eight sons of Jehiel (the founder of Gibeon) by his wife Maachah (1 Chron. viii, 30; ix, 36). B.C. post 1612.

Zu'riel (Heb. Tsuríel, צֹרִיאֵל, my rock is God; Sept. Ζουρίηλ; Vulg. Suriel), the son of Abihail and chief of the Merarite Levites at the time of the Exode (Numb. iii, 35). B.C. 1658.

Zurishad'dai (Heb. Tsurishadday, צֹרִישַׁדַּי, my rock is the Almighty = Zuriel [comp. Ammishaddai in the context]; Sept. Ζουρισσαδαι; Vulg. Surisaddai), the father of Shelumiel, which latter was chief of the tribe of Simeon at the time of the Exode (Numb. i, 6; ii, 12; vii, 36, 41; x, 19). B.C. ante 1658.

Zu'zim (Heb. only in the plur. and with the art.

haz-Zuzim', זוזים, the Zuzites; Sept. translates ἰσχυροὶ, like Jerome in Quæst. Heb. "gentes fortes;" but the Vulg. has Zuzim; A. V. "the Zuzims"), the name of an ancient people, who, lying in the path of Chedorlaomer and his allies, were attacked and overthrown by them (Gen. xiv. 5 only). Of the etymology or signification of the name nothing is known. The Sept., Targum of Onkelos, and Samar. version (perhaps reading or mistaking for זוזים) render it "strong people." The Arabic version of Saadiab (in Walton's Polyglot) gives ed-Duhakin, by which it is uncertain whether a proper name or an appellative is intended. Others understand by it "the wanderers" (Le Clerc, from 131) or "dwarfs" (Michaelis, Suppl. No. 606). Hardly more ascertainable is the situation which the Zuzim occupied. The progress of the invaders was from north to south. They first encountered the Rephaim in Ashteroth-karnaim (near the Leja, in the north of the Hauran); next the Zuzim in Ham; and next the Emim in Shaveh-kiriathaim. The last-named place has not been identified, but was probably not far north of the Ammon. There is therefore some plausibility in the suggestion of Ewald (Geesch. i, 308, note), provided it is etymologically correct, that Ham, 131, is 135, Am, i. e. Ammon; and thus that the Zuzim inhabited the country of the Ammonites, and were identical with the Zamzumaim (q. r.), who are known to have been exterminated and succeeded in their land by the Ammonites. Zwick, JOHANN, preacher and Reformer in the city and region of Constance, Switzerland, was born about 1496. He studied theology and jurisprudence, being made doctor of laws at Padua, and priest about 1518. He then came under the influence of Luther and Zwingli, married, and entered on a pastorate at Kiedlingen in 1522; from which he was expelled, on account of his evangelical tendencies, by the Nuremberg Diet of 1525. After a time he was associated with Ambrose Blarer as preacher, and in the conduct of the Reformation at Constance, which was brought to a successful consummation in 1531. Zwick was especially concerned with the settling of plans for the education of the young, and with the introduction of an order of discipline in the Church. After the completion of such labors, the preachers of Constance engaged in the work of extending the Reformation over surrounding regions in Württemberg and Switzerland, Blarer being prominent in such service, while Zwick was by that fact obliged to restrict his efforts to more limited areas. He gave twelve years of most arduous and exacting toil to the Church, and exhausted his entire patrimony before he applied to the council (1538) that provision might be made for his support. The union efforts of Bucer engaged the attention of Zwick in common with the Protestant clergy in general, but did not commend themselves to his judgment, though Luther's personality had somewhat impressed him at the Wittenberg Concord (May, 1536); and he thought that some concessions might be made to a man so eminent, especially since a meaning which the Swiss churches could endorse might be found in the great Reformer's doctrine of the bodily presence in the sacrament. He was eventually, however, constrained to see that no true agreement was possible upon this question; and his influence, joined with that of the other clergymen of Constance, gave to that city the unpleasant notoriety of being the only one which had not replied to Luther's agreement with Bucer. Zwick was also involved in the Schwenkfeldian disputes. He obtained possession of manuscripts written by Schwenkfeld, circulated them among friends, and aided in bringing the writings of Vadian against that agitator before the public. Zwick died as the clouds of the Smalcald war began looming in the distance. After being repeatedly unwell, he went to Bischoffzell, in Thurgovia, to minister to an orphaned congregation, in which the ravages of pestilence were carrying away from ten to thirty adults, and as many children, in each week to the grave. He was himself attacked, and lay for several weeks rejoicing in the triumphs of faith, and died Oct. 23, 1542. Dr. Voegeli, the physician whom Constance had sent to care for her favorite preacher, came away from the sick-bed, where, he said, he had learned how to die, and soon followed his friend into the other world. Zwick was constantly busy with his pen; but he preferred to publish the works of others rather than his own productions. He caused the publication of a Latin-German New Testament at Zurich in 1535, and wrote a preface for it. He also prepared a number of catechisms. His principal importance to literature lies, however, in the field of hymnology. He issued a hymn-book in 1536 (?), and a second enlarged edition in 1540. A collection of Latin hymns and prayers for educated young people, entitled Rhapsodiae, whose date and authorship were long unknown, has recently been found attributed to Zwick in a note of the 16th century written in the Zurich copy of the Rhapsodiae. See Zwick, Works and Letters, generally unpublished; Schelhorn, Sammlungen für d. Geschichte, i, 41 sq.; the more recent biographies of Blarer; and Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Zwingli (Zwingle, or Zuingli; Lat. Zwinglius or Zuinglius), ULRICH, the prime mover in the Reformation in Switzerland nearly as much as Luther in Germany, was born Jan. 1, 1484, in Wildhaus, a village in the upper valley of the Toggenburg, in the Canton of St. Gall. Such was the precocity which he displayed in his youth that his father resolved to send him to Basel to be educated. He made such rapid progress in his studies that he soon accomplished the work upon the prosecution of which he had entered at Basel, and he was removed to Berne, and placed under the tuition of Lupulus, a distinguished scholar of his day, with whom he studied for some time. The Dominican monks in this place, attracted by his talents and rising reputation, sought to entrap him into their order; but his father, in order to remove him from the scene of temptation, sent him off to Vienna. Here he remained for a brief period and then returned to Basel, where he pursued his theological studies. Under the instruction of Thomas Wytenbach, he was led into a more liberal course of study than theological students had been wont to pursue. The charms of the classics were unfolded to him under the tuition of his learned master, and were cheerfully substituted for the dry husks of scholastic theology. In 1506 he became a pastor in Glarus, not far from his native village. Here he devoted himself most diligently to the study of God's Word, copying with his own hand the original of Paul's Epistles, and transferring it to memory. During the same period he mingled in the strife of arms against the French. Influences which we will not stop to explain induced him to leave Glarus and become pastor in Einsiedeln, a famous spot in popish pilgrimage and superstition, where he preached doctrines which he had drawn from his study of the Holy Scriptures; and when, in 1519, he was called to the Cathedral Church of Zurich, he proclaimed the same truths which he had preached in the Church of the Virgin of the Hermitage in Einsiedeln. Multitudes flocked to hear him, attracted by the novelty of the doctrines he taught and the eloquence with which he spoke. He delivered expository discourses on Matthew and the Epistles of Paul and of Peter. The effect of his honest preaching of the Gospel soon became apparent in the city and country, and his general character and opinions produced a deep and universal sensation. While this state of transition was so marked, the crisis was hastened, in 1518, by the arrival of Samson, the seller of indulgences. The traffic in these "Roman wares" roused the indignation of Zwingli, and led to a keen exposure and a successful resistance. Luther's writings were, at the same time, largely circulated at the recommendation of the Reformer. The plague broke out, and, during its continuance, though weak himself from exhaustion, Zwingli assiduously tended the sick and dying. His zealous labors grew in number and results, the simplicity of the Gospel was more distinctly apprehended by him; but the friends of the popeedom were enraged, and Zwingli was tried, in January, 1523, on a charge of heresy. Rome gained nothing by the trial. Zwingli presented sixty-seven propositions, and defended them from Scripture. The Reformer gathered courage with growing difficulties, and in 1524 the Council of Zurich remodelled the public worship according to the views and wishes of Zwingli. Pictures, statues, and relics were removed from the churches, and mass was abolished. Opposition to the Reformed doctrines was meanwhile gathering in the other cantons. The question arose, whether each canton was free to choose its own form of religion, or whether the Confederation should interfere; Zurich contended for its individual liberty and independence, but was opposed by the Waldstätter, or the primitive democratic cantons of Schwytz, Unterwald, Uri, and Lucerne. The triumph of the Reformation at Berne and other places threw those forest cantons into wilder commotion, and, in consonance with their views of their federal polity, they took up arms for Rome. Zurich, encouraged by Zwingli, called out its troops and put itself into a posture of defence. Efforts were made to maintain peace, but it was of no long duration, and after various diplomatic negotiations, hostilities finally commenced. Zurich had also lost somewhat of its earlier evangelical purity, while the neighboring states were conspiring for its ruin. In the awful emergency, when the public mind was alarmed by a series of omens and prodigies, the Reformer maintained tranquillity. The war began. Zurich was cowardly, dilatory, and far from being prepared; but the horn of the enemy echoed among their hills, and the devoted Zwingli mounted his caparisoned horse, took farewell of his wife and children, and went forth as a patriot and warrior to share in the common danger. His official position in the army, however, was that of chaplain, according to Swiss custom. The Zurichers marched to meet the Waldstätter, but were defeated at Cappel with great slaughter, Oct. 11, 1531. Zwingli was found, after the battle, lying on his back and his eyes upturned to heaven, with his helmet on his head, and his battle-axe in his hand. He had been struck near the commencement of the engagement, and then as he fell and reeled, he was several times pierced with a lance. According to some accounts, he was wounded while stooping to comfort a dying soldier. His last audible words were, "What of that? They can indeed kill the body, but they cannot kill the soul." He was living when discovered in the evening; but the infuriated fanatics soon despatched him. Next day his dead body was barbarously quartered and burned. Thus perished this hero-martyr. A plain monument in granite, erected in 1838, marks the spot where he died.

But the Protestant faith gained the victory not in Zurich alone, nor was Zwingli the only Swiss reformer. Ecclampadius did a good work at Basel. In Berne, also, the Reformation was successful. The Reformation being not only a religious movement, but in some respects a political one, it attracted to its support many persons who were contending for the spread of more liberal opinions throughout Switzerland. Zwingli was a patriot, and those who were immediately associated with him were patriots, and he believed that there could be no influence so potent to reach and transform the characters of his countrymen as the Gospel. There was substantial agreement between Luther and Zwingli on all the cardinal doctrines of the Protestant faith. On the doctrine of the eucharist there was, however, a radical difference of opinion. Luther held to "consubstantiation," declaring that there were present, in some mysterious way, the body and the blood of the Lord Jesus in the elements administered at the Lord's supper; while Zwingli contended that the sacrament was designed to be merely a reminder of the sufferings and death of the Saviour. The controversy was a bitter one. Neither party could convince the other. All that could be done was to lay down fourteen articles of faith which were to be received by both parties on the basis of the Augsburg Confession. But these minor controversies, for such they seem to us to be, must have lost all their interest in the presence of the grave dangers which threatened the very existence itself of the Reformation in Switzerland. Zwingli led the Reform movement in the other German cantons of Switzerland, and attended the conference at Berne in 1528, which resulted in the abolition of the mass. He was invited to a personal conference with Luther and Melancthon at Marburg, September, 1529, to adjust the only serious doctrinal difference between them on the eucharistic Presence. He counselled energetic measures for the promotion of the Reform in his native land, but was defeated by the policy of hesitation which prevailed in Berne. He also entered into bold political combinations with Philip of Hesse for the triumph of the Protestant cause in Germany, and addressed the emperor of Germany and the king of France with a confession of his faith. Zwingli was a bold Reformer, an able scholar, an eloquent preacher, a patriotic republican, and far-sighted statesman. He lacked the genius and depth of Luther and Calvin, the learning of Melancthon and Ecclampadius; but he was their equal in honesty of purpose, integrity of character, heroic courage, and devotion to the cause of Reformation, and surpassed them in liberality. His prominent intellectual trait was clear, strong common-sense.

Zwingli's principal works are a Commentary on the True and False Religion (1525):—a sermon On Providence (preached at Marburg, 1529):—his Confession of Faith, addressed to Charles V of Germany (1530):—a similar Exposition of Faith, addressed to Francis I of France (July, 1531, three months before his death). This last document is clear, bold, spirited, and full of hope for the triumph of the truth; warns the king against the slanderous misrepresentations of Protestant doctrines, and entreats him to give free course to the Gospel, and to forgive the boldness with which he dared to approach his majesty. A few years afterwards (1536) Calvin dedicated, in a most eloquent preface, his famous Christian Institutes to the same monarch, but with equal want of direct success. Zwingli represents only the first stage in the history of the Reformed Church. His work was completed after his death by his successor, Bullinger, at Zurich, and still more by Calvin at Geneva.
